"The sale will feature projects made throughout the semester by upper level UMass ceramic students," said Green. "They range from a number of pottery pieces including mugs, plates, flower pots, and hanging planters to blown glass and decorative glass vases."

"The sale gives UMass students an opportunity to sell some things and get exposed to the public when they otherwise wouldn't be able to," said Green.

The sale has been an annual event for the past six years, said Green. "It was started to give exposure to ceramic students. It is a learning experience for them and is also good public relations," she said.

For many students, it's their first opportunity to sell some of their work, said Green. Twenty students from ceramics level III through graduate level will be displaying items they've made, she said.

"A lot of people don't know what goes on down here in the Munson Annex, even though it is right on the way from the campus center to Southwest, but the response to the sale is always good. People come in to browse around and express interest in what's going on," said Vinnie Marasa, a senior majoring in ceramics at UMass.

"Customers come back year after year," said Francine Osereko, a UMass graduate student. "It's nice because the sale gives students the experience of selling their own work and getting people's reactions to it," she said.

the measure would actually reduce customers' fuel adjustment charges on electricity bills. But they said the measure at least would help slow the sharp rise in such charges.

The bill calls for adding a 10-person unit to the state Department of Public Utilities to check on whether power companies are buying oil as cheaply as possible and burning it efficiently. The new unit would be allowed to spend up to $100,000 a year for monitoring and collect that money from the utilities, which, in turn, would collect it from customers.

Barry Margolin, Fair Share's representative, said he had no doubts the monitoring would pay for itself in savings. Just catching one mistake in the $1 billion-a-year fuel purchases by Massachusetts utilities would probably offset the increased regulatory costs, Margolin said.

In an unrelated incident $1,200 of musical equipment was reported stolen yesterday from the Art Studio in the Berkshire Dining Commons in the Southwest Residential Area.

The stolen equipment and instruments included a Martin Acoustic guitar, and electric Jazzmaster guitar, an amplifier head, and an amplifier, police said. The theft took place sometime between Saturday and Monday, police said.

Three vandalized cars were reported to University police yesterday.

A car parked in an Orchard Hill parking lot was found scraped and dented, hood caved in, upholstery slashed, glass gauges broken, and shift lever damaged, police said. Also dirt was found in the gas tank, police said. The damage was done between Dec. 2 and Dec.8, police said.

Also in the Orchard Hill Residential Area a state-owned Jeep was found with its battery stolen and a side mirror smashed, police said. The crime took place between Friday and Monday, police said.

CORRECTION

In Tuesday's (Dec. 9) Collegian, The article on page 4 titled, "University Police arrest Five, Four taken into custody," it was incorrectly reported that a student arrested by University Police for disrupting the peace, threatened people "with burglary." It should have read, "threatened people verbally."

House announcement last weekend that Soviet preparations for moving into Poland have been completed.

Reports reached Washington from Warsaw that the Soviets have asked the Polish government for permission to move four military divisions across the country into East Germany.

That could lay the groundwork for the Red Army's intervention in a Soviet effort to reverse the liberalization of Communist rule brought about by Polish workers and intellectuals.

The Pentagon and State Department said the reports were just rumors.

"I know of no basis for such reports," Secretary of State Edmund S. Muskie told reporters after a secret briefing on the Polish situation for members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Just before she began the marathon Kennan said, "I think it's a wonderful way to honor one of America's finest poets."

While Kennan was finishing her reading, Holly Hirst, 19, one student organizer, explained her part in the marathon.

"We helped with the publicity and will take turns staying up throughout the night to make sure there is always a reader," she said.

Meanwhile, Kennan read the last line of Dickinson's ninth poem: "This was the road, those children flutter home."

The committee reached its verdict after investigating Chalifour's complaints of election violations, including the early closing of the balloting and the failure of election officials to request identification from voters.

Current Sylvan President Christopher Ferretti said an interim committee, elected from House Councils, will run the area government until new elections are held in conjunction with Student Government Elections next March.

★Outing club

Members of the club have enjoyed a variety of day long trips throughout New England along with a vast range of trips such as volcano hopping in South America, investigating national parks in Utah, the Grand Canyon, Colorado and Mount Ranier in Washington.

Members are also allowed reduced rates on the club's cabin in the northern white mountains in Bethlehem, N.H., McGlew said. The club planned and built the cabin itself a few years ago after raising $10,000 by selling beer at the spring concert and through alumni pledges. The club is now planning a sauna for relaxing after exhausting trips, he said.

"The club is a lot of fun," said McGlew. "You meet people with the same interests, and can just go out and enjoy yourself."

Located in room 428 of the Campus Center, the club offers trips for both members and non-members. Persons interested in a trip being planned may sign up on a first-come, first-served basis, said McGlew. After the meetings, held Mondays at 7 in the Campus Center, trips with available space are posted on the bulletin board near the Student Union Ballroom.

Moran said he had wanted the committee to extend its deadline through the end of this week and for the senate to convene a special session next Monday to act on his appointment. Tonight's is the last scheduled meeting of the semester.

Acting Attorney General Lisa Zeibel, who was named at last week's senate meeting following the resignation of Dana Collier, will remain in the position until at least the beginning of next semester, Moran said.

the Minutemen having a hard time boxing-out under the boards.

"We have got to play better as a team if we want to win ball games," coach Ray Wilson said.

Field goal percentage in the first half for the Minutemen was 46 percent compared to an impressive 51 percent put out by the Indians.

High scorer in the first half for UMass were freshmen Green captaining the high honors with 13 points, and guard co-captains Stan Washington and Tom Witkos with eight points each.

The first half ended with the former UMass lead of 12 points dwindled to a meager four points, 39-35. The Indians were coming on strong, breathing down the Minutemen's necks.

The second half opened up sloppily for UMass, with the men having a hard time controlling the ball. Bryant took advantage of this problem by bringing the UMass lead to nothing, tying up the score at 39-39, with just 2:07 gone in the half.

UMass had lost their intensity in the game once again. "We have got to play better than we did, though at the most we played a good six minutes tonight," Wilson said.

Coming up with a good performance in the second half was guard Stan Washington (20 points on the night) who played a considerable debut to the hapless sharpshooting a score-hungry Indian back-back-back-ten score ball.

Washington is the man who plays a good heads-up game with his open-mindedness on the ball and his fast and brisk moving to perfect fruition.

Instrumental in the second half the Minutemen regained their lead, outscoring the Indians 49-44. At this point the UMass team seemed to be holding their lead in a stalemate with not much happening for a few minutes in the half.

UMass started closing down intermittently and the Indians started taking advantage and closing in on the Minutemen. The UMass lead closed in, and at 4:47 left in the second half, UMass was ahead by only one point, 69-67.

The teams kept exchanging with each other and the game ended with a score at 69-69, sending the game into overtime.

UMass kept up its head in the five minute overtime action with the men playing aggressively and pushing out with a victory of 80-76.

Another win is "Winner-and-after-the-game." A win is a win is a win.

what we need. We needed a win."

DeFina was sure to say that UMass got a win. The sophomore from New Bedford had seemingly won the game for the Minutemen in regulation time when he drove in something that resembled a push-back shot, with 30 seconds left, to put UMass up 66-65. DeFina also hooped a preceding shot-in on Bryant and added a free throw to make it 68-65. But Bryant tied the game on a basket three layup with two seconds left, and was left to 40 seconds of eight free throws in the overtime.

DeFina dished off for Edwin Green with 18 seconds left in overtime, and Mr. Green made no doubt about it all. His dunk had more bounce to the ounce, and UMass had finally won a basketball game.

"Boy, we won, and that's important," UMass head coach Ray Wilson said. "I just wish we had played better than we did. We didn't play basketball as a team. I don't know. Maybe our eyes got in the way out there."

It wasn't pretty. It took an overtime, and about half of the 1,622 who had turned up were gone by the time the final buzzer went off.

It was noisy, and shoddy and sweaty out, and UMass had finally won a basketball game.

"This game," DeFina was saying. "We just needed something to get us started, to get us going."

"Is this that something?" someone asked him.

"Damn," Tony DeFina said. "I hope so. I really do."

Tony DeFina went back into the locker room and there were a few more handshakes. Nothing special.

the starter. (The Iceman might hold the all-time record for closing time and when smoking establishments) and I saw this guy trying to break into my whole real estate establishment and I saw this guy trying to break into my whole real estate establishment. I had a major beef on, but I still don't what was happening. I walked over to him and grabbed him by the neck. He was scared shit. (The Iceman isn't that big, but he has a 31-inch neck) I knocked him out, threw him in the middle of the street, and left rubber on his arm as I was leaving."

The Iceman don't usually make it through 365 with fisticuffs. In fact, he don't make it through an all. That doesn't mean he didn't get a good job when he got out though. He became a house painter. But that he was driving to work and his truck broke down. This didn't faze the Iceman. He just gathered up all his paint and ladders and plunked them down at a bus stop. The bus came and at exactly the time the driver wouldn't let him on with all his equipment. No matter.

"I grabbed him by his shirt and clocked him off the bus. Then I told all the people 'Every one gets off this bus or I'll kill your self.' Nobody stepped on. I guess they thought I was serious. I just figured we got to work on time so I got my self on the bus and drove it away."

The Iceman usually does what he wants to do. He was running home from a Celtics game with his buddy the Rolls and the Iceman remembered that a couple of girls that he knew lived near the Garden. They were up to the apartment and knocked on the door. A girl opened the door, peered out, and what it was and screamed, "Oh my! It's him again! Call the police!"

On hearing this, the Iceman kicked down the door, chased out the girls and seized to his current occupance. "Ma Rolls, they love me."

The Iceman may know a few girls on the side, but now he is under the holy ware. He's married and has three kids. He is in with many newspapers. The Iceman's wedding didn't run clear smoothly. The Rolls knows the story well.

"We nike Rolls and years pulled up in the church all dressed up in our tuxes and we see The Iceman talking on the church steps wearing a gray t-shirt and dirty dungarees, drinking a Bud and smoking a cigar. We got out of the car and said 'What's wrong Iceman, what happened to the wedding?' He says 'Congratulate me Rolls, I'm a father, my wife had a kid last night. The wedding is next week. Everybody over my place for a few.'

The Iceman has quieted down a little (CAGE), but he still has his nights. Marco Simpkins, who played with and for the NU Huskies the past 10 months would see The Iceman just this past summer in a bar where the Rolls was working.

"The guy was unbelievable," Simkins said. "He was there for about an hour speaking Irish. Then he jumped up on the bar, took his shirt off and started grabbing bottles of booze off the shelf and pouring 'em. Then he started doing head-locks with this other huge guy until the guy was almost unconscious. The Iceman just stood there and laughed. It was unreal."

If you're ever in Boston and stop somewhere for a drink, you might meet The Iceman. If you do, buy him a drink. He'll tell you some pretty good stories.

The Minutemen pulled off their first win of the season against Bryant College last night at the Cage in overtime action, downing the Indians 85-76.

Coming out strong in the first half, the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team was ahead by a strong 12 points. Taking the lead early was Edwin Green, controlling the ball for UMass.

Green, high scorer with 19 points last night was hot early in the game hitting from all over the floor and rebounding off the boards well on both defense and offense. In the first half Green came up with 13 points and eight rebounds.

Once the Minutemen hit their high lead of 12 points they started on a straight downhill trend, which left them, at the end of the first half, up by only four points.

The Indians played on the UMass men's slowness and whittled the lead down to a close four points. They were hitting the boards better than UMass, with Someone had a box, and so the music was on, low. "More Bounce to the Ounce" filtered through the locker room. There wasn't any hollering, nothing special. A few handshakes and pats on the back. Nothing special.

The University of Massachusetts men's basketball team, by virtue of their 85-76 overtime victory over Bryant College, had ended the losing streak at three.

It wasn't pretty. It wasn't even something to be particularly pleased with. But this team has been dumped on by everyone and their brother who thought they could do better, so there was some comfort there.

They had won.

"It's all mental," senior guard Tom Witkos was saying. "I mean, we didn't play really well tonight, but we won. We just weren't disciplined enough. It's mental."

Witkos, along with Connie Napper, is one of two seniors on the team. There's no next year, so a win is a win.

"It's really hard to get up for a team like Bryant," Witkos said. "They're Division 2, and we just can't get us for them like we do a Rutgers or a St. Bonaventure. But, we should have played better. What happened in the second half (when Bryant came back to tie the game and send it into overtime) happened because we just didn't play as a team. You can get away with that in high school, but no way in college."

Sophomore guard Tofty DePina, who scored seven of his 14 points on free throws in the overtime, stood there shaking his head.

"It feels real good," DePina said. "I don't want to get into that same routine as last year. I'm not pleased with the way we played tonight, but maybe this was just

Hoopwomen play host to Quebecois tonight

By BOB MITCHELL
Collegian Staff

The 2-1 UMass women's basketball team, coming off a big 78-55 trouncing of Harvard last Wednesday, hosts Bishop's University of Quebec tonight at 7:30 at the Cage.

"It will be one tough basketball game," UMass head coach Mary Ann Ozdarski said. "They're a well-coached team; he (head coach Wayne Hussey) does a good job with them."

Hussey must be doing something right; he has compiled an unbelievable 103-8 record in three years as mentor of the Lady Gaiters.

The Canadian squad built up an outstanding 41-2 mark last season and won its conference championship for the third consecutive year. One of the two Lady Gaiters' setbacks—an 86-76 loss last February 4—did, however, come at the hands of the Minutewomen.

Bishop's, which has finished third, fourth and fifth in the Canadian Nationals the last three years, is led by returning guard Sue Hyland. Hyland, a 5-5 guard who ended with a 9.6 points-per-game average last year, will lead the Quebecois into the Cage in hopes of revenging last year's pitfall.

Other key players are forwards Connie Clason who tossed in nine points per game last season and Andrea Blackwell who contributed an 8.9 average. Denise Dignard and Maria Bobyn round out the probable Lady Gaiters starters.

Bishop's major threats off the bench are Wendy Verrecchia, a 6-1 forward/center and Karen McComber, a 5-11 forward. Another potential powerhouse is 6-1 freshman center Bonnie MacNaughton.

The Minutewomen, who split two games in the UConn Tournament prior to the Harvard game, will be relying heavily on the services of 6-2 senior forward Julie Ready. Ready, who leads UMass with a whopping 28-point average, paced the Minutewomen to last year's win over Bishop's by pumping in 33 points.

Although the hoopwomen's second leading scorer has just an 8.3 average (Ginger Legare), Ozdarski points out the performance of her guards in setting up Ready inside. "Our perimeter people are really doing a nice job recognizing situations in which she (Ready) is open," she said. "Twenty-one of our 41 assists have gone to the perimeter players; that's outstanding."

Joining Ready and Legare up front will be Tricia Corcoran, a 5-7 junior, while Jennifer Gray and Sherry Gollings are the probable Minutewomen starting guards.

Grapplers face Mass Maritime

By SUE BRIDGMAN
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts wrestling squad is looking for another victory this evening, after their strong showing over the weekend in the Coast Guard Invitational. Tonight they take on Mass. Maritime Academy in Boyden gym at 7 p.m.

UMass finished third out of 17 teams, and showed some outstanding individual efforts by Dana Rasmussen, Mike Carroll, and Dave McEntee.

Mass. Maritime also competed in the Invitational and finished eighth overall. But UMass Coach Dave Amato is not taking them lightly. "You have to meet them head on," he said.

Last season, a strong UMass squad proved to be too much, defeating Mass. Maritime on their home turf, 26-17.

As Amato put it, "We probably are favored but anything can happen."

The real Iceman (not George Gervin)

The Iceman still goes to Northeastern football games.

He was at the NU-BU game. He didn't care if the Huskies were losing 35-20 to Rick Taylor's Terriers. The Iceman likes college football, plain and simple.

Stephen Freker

"I hate pro football," he says. "It makes me sick to see guys gettin' paid to hit somebody. In college you do it for the fun of it."

The Iceman played college football and he knows what he's talking about. He played for three same NU Huskies under head coach "Bo" Lyons who's retiring this year. The Iceman doesn't like being told what to do. He doesn't like Bo Lyons.

"I'm glad that guy's retiring." The Iceman said recently over a shot of pepperment schnaps. "He's one guy I'd like to catch in a dark alley. He made me play linebacker. I wanted to play fullback. I love to hit people but I like to run with the ball and hit people even better."

Don't get The Iceman mixed up with the San Antonio Spur's star forward George Gervin. The Iceman was the Iceman when Gervin was still in junior high school scoring 65 points a game. The real Iceman hails from Belmont, Mass., and is sort of a patron saint of Malden High School. If you graduated from Malden High, you probably have heard of The Iceman or you might even have met him.

The Iceman had a pretty illustrious high school career himself. He went to a Belmont-Arlington hockey game one night and got into a little altercation with some kids from Arlington. He was by himself (the Iceman doesn't have many friends) and the other kid had several buddies with him. They started fighting and one thing led to another.

"The kid was on top of me and I was starting to get beat." The Iceman will tell you. "I've never lost a fight in my life and I wasn't about to start then so I had to do something. I grabbed a hold of this kid's ear and started chomping, eventually it came off and I jumped up and yelled 'Who's next!'. I didn't get any takers."

The Iceman was supposed to be a star in college since he was a great running back in high school, but somehow it never came about. He did have some highlights in his Northeastern football career though. One afternoon during practice at Parsons Field in Brookline, someone spotted a couple of guys trying to steal one of the assistant coach's car. The Iceman led about eight other players to chase after the car. Traffic is pretty congested in that section of town, so The Iceman was able to catch the car at a red light.

"I seen the car atop and I thought 'What are these guys, crazy? We'll kill 'em now'. Then I took a runnin' start and dove through the top of the car (it was a convertible) and started punching whoever stuck up their heads. The coach was happy we got the car back so we didn't run laps that day after practice."

Somebody tried to steal my car one time. I was coming out of some bar in Boston one night around two-thirty in

Polish Union Rejects Charges of Spreading Chaos, Anarchy

By Roland Prinz
Associated Press Writer

WARSAW, Poland — Poland's new Solidarity union yesterday rejected charges by the Polish army and the Soviet bloc that the independent minded labor movement was spreading chaos and anarchy in Poland and said the union was fighting for the "fate of our country."

The Western allies, concerned about the possibility of a Soviet intervention, dispatched radar planes to Europe to monitor Soviet troop movements on Poland's borders. U.S. Secretary of Defense Harold Brown said in Brussels that Soviet forces have completed preparations for possible intervention in Poland if the Kremlin decides to do so.

The Communist Party daily Trybuna Ludu blamed speculators for worsening shortages of butter, bread, milk, and other foods in shops.

In a Moscow speech, Soviet Defense Minister Dmitri F. Ustinov called for "heightened vigilance" against what he called imperialist attempts "to damage the positions of the socialist countries - specifically of socialist Poland - of developing countries and of the national liberation movement."

Western and Czechoslovak sources in Prague reported Soviet troop movements toward Poland's southern border, but said such movements are not unusual.

Administration sources in Washington said the United States and its allies are weighing "possible collective responses," such as cutbacks in trade, credit and technology to the East bloc if the Soviets intervene in Czechoslovakia.

For the third straight day the official newspaper of the Polish army complained about "lack of order" in the country and warned it would be "suicide" for Poles to ignore what it termed Western plans to undermine Poland's strategic importance to the Soviet bloc.

The newspaper Zolnierz Wolnosci warned against "groups and people who would like to escalate the difficulties." It noted that important transportation and communication lines from the Soviet Union to East German cross Poland and said, "Closing the eyes to imperialistic plans, attempts and projects would mean suicide."

In a statement issued from solidarity headquarters in Gdansk, the union rejected allegations that the union was sowing unrest and said it was trying to promote cooperation and negotiations. "That is why we oppose all attempts to replace discussion favoring cooperation with insults and repression," the statement said.

The union was attempting to defend itself against allegations by the Soviet Union, other Warsaw Pact countries and by segments of the Polish press that militant workers were driving the country to the brink of chaos and challenging the Communist-controlled government.

"We are fighting for the highest ideal," the Solidarity statement said, "for the fate of our country."

The Soviet-led Warsaw Pact, concerned about emergence of the first independent trade union movement in a Communist country, has repeatedly warned that "counter-revolutionary forces" in Solidarity threaten Communist rule in Poland.

Applications for Aid Should be Sent Early

By Catherine Clabby
Daily Collegian Staff Writer

University of Massachusetts students who plan to receive financial aid for next fall should submit applications to the scholarship service in Princeton, N.J. in January instead of waiting for the March 1 deadline, the Financial Aid Office announced yesterday.

"The days when students could drag out their application process until after their parents filled out their income tax forms in April is over," Gerald Scanlan, associated director of financial aid said. "It is essential for their own financial well-being that they get them off to Princetown during January."

Scanlan said although the number of students eligible for assistance has increased through recent federal legislation, the Financial Aid Office expects no increase in available funds.

The Financial Aid Office will send every University student a financial aid form next week. Any student who does not receive a form by Wednesday should go to the Financial Aid Office to pick one up Scanlan said.

The forms will include applications for all federal and state institutional aid, Scanlan said.

Scanlan said students will suffer cuts in their financial awards as they did this previous summer and fall.

"We won't be awarding at the same levels. We just don't have the money anymore," he said. "This year we awarded allocations we expected to receive, but never did."

Scanlan suggested that students look into alternatives to University aid to help fund school expenses.

"They should try everything," he said. "Hustle for scholarships in home area, call high school guidance programs and look into student bank loans."

Undergraduate dependent students can borrow up to $2,500, independent students can borrow up to $3,000 and parents with dependent children in college can borrow up to $3,000 in student loans from banks at nine percent interest, Scanlan said.

Although the University's Financial Aid Office tried in the past to supply 70 to 80 percent of its financial assistance in grants or scholarships, that is no longer possible, Scanlan said.

"Students are going to graduate owing more money than ever before," he added.

Senate Bickers Over planned Memorial for John Lennon

By Ken Ross
Daily Collegian Staff Writer

In its last meeting of the semester, the Undergraduate Student Senate last night voted to allocate $1,000 to send the University of Massachusetts Marching Band to the inauguration of Ronald Reagan next month and bickered over a planned memorial for John Lennon and the conduct of co-President Richard Moran at last week's meeting.

Following a lengthy debate, the senate allocated the funds to send the band to Washington, D.C. for the inauguration ceremonies next month. Some members of the senate had expressed their opposition to president-elect Reagan as reasons for not favoring the move.

Co-president Moran also apologized to the senate for what was termed a "sexist" remark at last week's senate meeting.

The charges of sexism and misconduct were made by the Women's Caucus of the senate and stemmed from a comment made by Moran and directed toward a member of the Women's Caucus, to the effect that when the woman asked that Moran "speak into the microphone" when addressing the senate body, Moran replied "I know what I'd like to do with this microphone."

The incident arose last week amidst furious debate on the senat floor over Moran's proposal that Brian Burke be appointed acting-Attorney General in lieu of Dana Collier's resignation from

Direct Grading Cancelled

By Stephen Moran
Daily Collegian Staff Writer

The faculty of the University of Massachusetts voted yesterday to occupy the Whitmore Administration Building at noon on Monday and vowed to remain all day or until they are able to communicate with administrators about outstanding contract issues.

In a hastily called emergency session of the Massachusetts Society of Professors, the union which represents the 1290 faculty and librarians on campus, members also endorsed MSP Executive Board recommendations to cancel plans for direct grading this semester and to reschedule a planned teach in to next semester's first day of classes.

After Germanic Languages professor Sara Lennox introduced the motion, union members voted to enter the offices of the University's principle administrative officers and refuse to leave until union demands have been voiced and discussed.

The teach-in has been coordinated with the Amherst appearance of UMass President David C. Knapp and professors will request his presence and comments at the meetings.

During floor discussion of the motion, the faculty and librarians indicated a two-fold purpose in conducting Monday's job action. First, the teach-in will show administrators that the faculty supports the negotiating committee. Second, the action will relay to administrators the afculty pledge "not to conduct business as usual" next semester if a contract settlement has not been reached by then.

"We must show that the negotiating team represents the faculty and the faculty supports the negotiating team," said Bruce Laurie, a history professor and a member of the union's bargaining team.

By endorsing the Executive Council's recommendation to forgo withholding student grades from the administration, union members assured that grades will be recorded according to standard operating procedure. Grades will be reported on schedule, they said.

MSP President Peter D'Errico said union officials feared the Massachusetts Labor Relations Commission, which oversees union activities, would rule direct grading an interruption of services, and therefore illegal. If such a ruling was forthcoming, he said, faculty members would be subject to paycheck adjustments, fines or imprisonment.

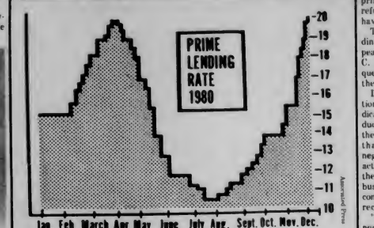
He warned of the poor logistics of direct grading, saying professors would be disbanded over intersession and still liable for MLRC penalties.

Angered at the slow pace of negotiations, which have lasted more than 6 months, the rank and file indicated its willingness to escalate the pace and severity of job actions if agreement is not reached over intersession.

Referring to Monday's occupation, English professor Jay Neugeboren said, "This time we're staying for a while, but next time we come, we may stay a little longer."

The rescheduling of the convocation to the first day of classes next semester was approved by the membership. The intent of the convocation, or teach-in, is to inform students of contract issues, said D'Errico.

Originally scheduled for last Wednesday, the convocation was postponed due to the sudden illness of Chancellor Henry Koffler.



Prime Rate at 20%; Economists see Recession

By Robert Burns
AP Business Writer

NEW YORK — The spiraling cost of business loans returned to record heights yesterday as banks nation wide raised prime-lending rates to 20 percent. Economists reacted with predictions of still higher rates and new warnings of recession.

The increase, from a prevailing rate of 19 percent set only last Friday, was initiated by Chase Manhatten Bank and matched by banks coast to coast, including New York's Citibank and San Francisco's Bank of America.

The prime last hit the record percent level in April, when credit controls were in place, and the two combined to aggravate the nation's last recession.

The prime is what banks charge on loans to their best risk corporate customers. Smaller businesses usually pay an even higher rate on loans.

The latest increase followed a furious run-up in interest rates during the past several weeks. Higher rates in the money markets made it more expensive for banks to acquire funds for lending purposes.

"Unless something dramatic happens immediately, we will see a 21 percent prime rate...within a week," predicted Thomas Thomson, chief economist at Crocker National Bank in San Francisco.

He said many banks are paying more than 20 percent on large deposits and must charge more to make a profit. Rates on deposits of more than $100,000 are not limited by federal regulations.

David Jones, a financial economist at the Wall Street firm of Aubrey G. Lanston & Co., said he believes the prime will reach at least 22 percent in a matter of weeks and cause another recession.

"The die is cast," he said. "There are indications we'll see a declining economy as early as this month."

Donald Maude, an economist with Merrill Lynch & Co., agreed. "I would have to think the high levels of interest rates are certainly going to be enough to throw the economy back into a recession in the first half of the new year," he said.

President-elect Ronald Reagan, said in Washington that the prime rate increase to 20 percent "is one of the things that has to be corrected." Asked how he would accomplish that, he said: "That's one of the things I'm going to find out in the next four years."

Not all economists believe a recession is imminent. Henry Kaufman, a partner in the Wall Street investment firm of Salomon Brothers, said Tuesday that he believes rates will remain high early next year but doubts the current sluggish economic recovery will be halted.

And a Commerce Department survey released yesterday said U.S. businesses plan to increase spending on plant and equipment by an inflation-adjusted 2.5 percent during the first half of next year.

■Rep. Jenrette Resigns

WASHINGTON (AP) — Rep. John Jenrette, his voice choking with emotion, announced yesterday he is resigning from the House as ABSCAM proceedings against him resulting from his conviction for bribery and conspiracy in the Abscam investigation.

The South Carolina Democrat told the House ethics committee he was submitting his resignation to Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, effective Wednesday.

"With the desire to spare this House ... from further embarrassment, I'm submitting to the speaker my resignation," Jenrette said, pausing as his voice choked.

"I do this with pain that none of you can ever know."

Jenrette made the announcement at a House ethics committee hearing to consider a proposal that it recommend his expulsion from Congress because of his conviction for bribery and conspiracy in the FBI's Abscam investigation.

■Grasso undergoes surgery

HARTFORD, Conn. (AP) — Gov. Ella Grasso was in guarded condition yesterday after surgeons removed one cancerous growth from her large intestine and bypassed another growth, saying it could be treated through chemotherapy, hospital officials said.

The discovery of the governor's intestinal cancer comes three weeks after doctors found cancer in her liver. Doctors have said they will not attempt surgery on that diseased organ but have ordered chemotherapy treatment instead.

The governor, 61, who has announced she will resign at the end of the month, was resting in a private room after the 2½ hour consultancy at Hartford Hospital. The operation involved removing a portion of the large intestine and inserting a tube to carry bodily wastes.

■Drinan D.C. Law Prof.

WASHINGTON (AP) — Rep. Robert F. Drinan will remain in Washington when his term expires in January and teach law at Georgetown University, an aide said yesterday.

Drinan spokesman Michael Shea said the congressman, a Jesuit priest, will teach a course on international law and human rights at the university's law school.

The Massachusetts Democrat also will remain an associate editor of America Magazine and act as writer for the National Catholic Reporter, Shea said.

■R.I. Services Resume

PROVIDENCE, R.I. (AP) — Schools reopened and mounds of rotting garbage began disappearing from sidewalks yesterday following the settlement of a five-day strike sparked by city worker layoffs.

The truce is seen as a victory for Mayor Vincent A. Cianci Jr., whose authority to fire municipal workers as a budget cutting step was confirmed by union.

Cianci won the approval of Local 1033 of the Public Service Employees Union to cut at least 232 workers from the payroll in an effort to trim the city's $11 million budget deficit.

"We're on the road to restoring this city's fiscal health," said Cianci, who expects the layoffs to save about $8.5 million.

The union, which includes about a third of the city's 6,000 member work force, also pledged to settle further conflicts through arbitration rather than walkouts.

■King Gets Tough

BOSTON (AP) — Adult porn convictions who prey on the elderly would get at least one full year in jail under new legislation by Gov. Edward J. King.

His proposal, unveiled at a press conference yesterday would impose mandatory terms for people who grab a purse or pick the pockets of someone 60 or older.

For more serious crimes against the elderly, such as muggings or armed robbery, the mandatory term would be two years. No parole or suspension of sentence would be allowed.

First-time offenders and property would be exempt from the new penalties, but the bill does not cover "white collar" crimes against the elderly, such as confidence schemes and consumer fraud.

■MX may harm Land

WASHINGTON (AP) — A draft environmental impact statement on the controversial MX missile system has concluded the project would mean "major socio-economic changes in the character of the region's environment in the desert regions of Utah and Nevada. The 1,500 page report also says the impact on precious water resources in the area could be "significant" and possibly long-term.

The draft report, which is expected to be released to the public later this month, is the result of a two-year study by the air force and various federal agencies.

Reflections On the Passing Of a Giant

As John Lennon staggered towards his apartment building in New York City Monday, a decade of speculation about a possible Beatles' reunion expired.

"A great tragedy," said Ronald Reagan.

"The 80's are upon us," said another.

Some of us just wept — silent, shaken, and confused.

It would be redundant and tedious to list all of the pop stars who have gone under, or to read the toll of American assassinations in our lifetimes. To me, the martyrdom of John Lennon is different than any of these. First was his lofty stature as a spokesman and entertainer for a generation (our generation, if I may be so bold), but also, unlike so many rockers, there was no hint of self destructiveness in his demise. Lennon had spent his last five years raising his son Sean, a child born from the true love that he and Yoko Ono shared for thirteen years. A year that even his first wife Cynthia recognized as remarkable as soon as the Japanese American woman came into his life.

Lennon turned 40 this year and entered his fifth decade with a mature optimism. Yoko was handling the family's business and John was doing the housekeeping. Lennon was never afraid to be different. He had indeed become a responsible parent. The reason why kids are crazy is because nobody can face the responsibility of bringing them up. Everybody's too scared to deal with children all the time, so we reject them and send them away and torture them. The ones who survive are the conformists- their bodies are cut to the size of the suits the ones we label good. The ones who don't fit the suits either are put in mental homes or become artists."

The flurry of memories provoked by this untimely slaughter will, of course, be different for everyone. Personally, I recall the death of John Kennedy- one of my earliest memories. It didn't mean much to me then. It still doesn't. I also think about my good fortune when I was eleven to be living in England and watching the first public showing of Magical Mystery Tour, which was aired on BBC television the day after Christmas. I got a good laugh out of "I Am The Walrus." Then there was the time when I was sitting in a doughnut shop at about three in the morning, nearly regurgitating my cruller as I realized that the muzak poisoning my ears was meant to be a symphonic rendition of "Day Tripper." I remember seeing A Hard Day's Night for the third time and finally realizing what it meant when John, with a wry smile and Liverpudlian twinkle in his eye, sniffed the top of a Coca Cola bottle. Lennon was, after all, a great wit. When asked if the Beatles were mods or rockers, John's immediate response was: "Neither, we're mockers."

I don't think John would want us to stay in mourning too long; he was a man who seldom looked back, learning his lessons the hard way, and moving on. I sincerely hope that the Boston Pops don't do a John Lennon tribute, and I pray that Don Kirshner doesn't find some way to get his greedy hands in on this tragedy.

As for ourselves, by now most of us have heard "Imagine," "Come Together," "Happiness is a Warm Gun," and "Working Class Hero" many, many times. Silence, though, can be beautiful music too. Let's honor this great man, our brother, as his widow suitably requests: with a moment of silence and prayer.

And, if there's room in your grieved heart, pray for Mark David Chapman also.

GET UP, STAND UP, STAND UP FOR YOUR LIFE Despite rumors to the contrary, reggae artist Bob Marley is alive and well and living in Sasa Mani, South Ethiopia. An Island Records spokesman told England's Record Mirror (Nov. 22, 1980) that Marley is "trying to get some rest where he can't be pestered." The spokesman denied the rumors that Marley is either dead or dying from cancer, saying he will be releasing a Christmas single with his family and plans to tour after he's recuperated from "severe nervous exhaustion." 'Union Cafe' Offers a Variety of Creative Arts

Creating a positive community culture is the idea behind a new series of musical coffeehouses by a group of University of Massachusetts students featuring a variety of local musicians and open stage for poetry, satire, and other creative arts.

Called the "Union Cafe" and located in the Student Union Building, the free public series hopes to attract young and old alike and urges local artists to bring instruments, writings and other cultural works.

Their first program last Friday night featured Irish tunes, folk music and poetry and was a great success with over 100 people attending.

Jazz with the Dave Phillips Trio will be presented Friday beginning at 8 p.m. It will be held in the Earthfoods-Commonwealth room. Refreshments will be provided by Earthfoods.

"For the past two months about 12 people have been meeting once a week through pot luck dinners to share music and poetry and they wanted to expand it, so they thought of having the cafe," said group member Lewis Geffen.

The group was able to get funding for the coffeehouses this semester with a grant from the UMass Fine Arts Council. Depending on the feedback they get from these performances, they will continue to have coffeehouses next semester and open it up more to members of the five-college community, Geffen said.

"We will have to start searching for funding for next semester if we are going to run this again, Geffen said. "We will continue to have coffeehouses with other groups to form coffeehouses," he said.

Hatch Features 'Hard Rock'

The accent will be on variety this (abbreviated) weekend at The Hatch. The bar will be closed Saturday, due to the Chancellor's banquet, and tonight and Friday will feature two quite opposite bands.

Friday night The Hatch will rock out with local favorites, Foun tainhead, and tonight the Boston based Human Sexual Response will perform their own blend of harmonies, hard rock and cool jerk.

Human Sexual Response have been one of the most popular new bands in Boston, since releasing their first single, "Jackie Onassis," two years ago. The recent release of their first album, Figure 14 (on Epic Records) seems destined to propel them to nationwide success. The seven-member group consists of: Malcolm Travis, drums; Chris Maclachlan, bass; Rob Gilbert, guitar; as well as four vocalists - Larry Bangor, Casey Cameron, Winkie Davis and Dini Lamot.

The unique sound of Response has been quite well received on their previous visits to this area and with their album amassing raves far and wide, this show looks promising. WCVB TV, Channel 5 in Boston, will be videotaping this concert for later broadcast. Admission is $2.50.

Friday night Fountainhead will bring their hard-rocking sound to The Hatch. Fountainhead hails from Connecticut and have been around for a while, remaining favorites at nearly every club in the area. The group alternates originals with covers of classic tuners, and provides a good time wherever they go. The cover charge will be $2.

Reagan And Social Darwinism

Through the American Electoral Process we have just witnessed the election of a staunch conservative to the executive office of the Presidency of the United States. Not only is the American President-elect, Ronald Reagan, a staunch conservative, but in being the representative of the constituent "far right," "radical right" or "hard right" tends to exemplify the most reactionary ideals in the annals of western political thought.

The other day I saw an interesting bumper sticker that read "Impeach Reagan before it's too late!" Is this an exaggeration? Are things as bad as they seem? Is the political expression of this new right conservatism exemplary of a philosophical tradition that is as dangerous and deliterious as it seems?

It is most remarkable and ironic, but certainly understandable, that the most advanced industrial country in the world is the most de-historicized and de-politicized in the world. That is, socio-political consciousness in the United States of America is among the lowest in the world despite its advance industrial and technological capacity. Hence, not only does this go a ways in explaining the failure of many Americans to think of any alternative(s) to the iron-clad and un-democratic two-party system, but it too exposes the futility of people facing this intricate electoral process and the frustration revealed in turning to Ronald Reagan.

Nevertheless, Ronald Reagan's election campaign musings and his pre-election campaign ideals expose Reagan as the personification of some of the most reactionary views in modern times. If one studies these views, even superficially, one will discover that these now most conventional ideas and ideals represent a very old philosophical stream of classical conservative thought within the confines of Western Political Tradition.

Evident is the Acceptance of Nicolo Machiavelli's political commentary and Machiavellian principles of a forced and pretentious "human nature" which defines humans as power-hungry, acquisitive, nefarious, deceptive, unurious, sinister, etc. "Reaganism" also incorporates such classical conservative principles as "the discipline of Laissez Faire," "the dogma of work-ethic," "the functionalist notion of the most developed and efficient," and "the desireability of manifest destiny." There are many currents inherent in contemporary "Reaganism," but the most pronounced is archaic Social Darwinism, renovated and re-situated to account for the great changes that have taken place since the 19th century.

If we look at 19th century Social Darwinism, and Herbert Spencer, its chief proponent and also one of the founders of the field of sociology, we can see remarkable parallels to the political philosophy expressed in Ronald Reagan's "New Beginning." Spencer's expropriation of Darwin's scientific theory of evolution from Darwin's Origin of The Species (1859) took a genetic-biological theory and translated it through sociological strictures. The Darwinian concept of natural selection, couched in the new sociological parlance, became the letter of Spencer's coined phrases, "the struggle for existence" and "the survival of the fittest."

Social Darwinist individualism and Social Darwinist mythology and ideology, besides engendering an elementally crude race theory, also pre-supposes an economic theory tout of the Bourgeois Period as well). Both racism and class oppression are ostensibly rationalized and justified by Social Darwinist Philosophy.

Spencer's elitarian ideological forge of the post and contra-enlightment principles, countered with the socialization of Darwinism (via Social Darwinism), unveiled Sociology as the foundation of a mythic enterprise proclaiming a functional ethos for Capitalism.

"The chief task of the sociologist, as Spencer saw it, was to convince mankind that society would improve in proportion as the powers of government and the sentimental idealism of charity were restrained from interfering with free economic forces" (Thomas F. Gossett's Race: The History of an Idea in America).

Does this sound familiar? That Spencer's 19th century theory, from his First Principles, was the apogee of bourgeois thought, reveals much about the system of Capitalism. But that the ideas can surface again with new force nearly one hundred years later is even more astonishing.

The similarities are most striking: There are more "...Spencer was opposed to public education, to free libraries, to a government post office, and to the mint. All these 'socialistic' institutions would end not by improving society but by paving the way to its degeneration. People should pay for the education of their children if they want to have them educated. Free libraries merely led to the stocking of "trashy novels. He was opposed to sanitation laws, to efforts to license doctors and nurses, and to compulsory vaccination. People who were stupid enough not to avail themselves of proper medical care ought to be allowed to reap the consequences of their folly. In the Ideal Society there would be no social legislation, no regulation of industry, no poor relief, nothing which would interfere with the laws of natural selection." (Ibid., p148)

Hence, the philosophy of this conservative Renaissance or Neo-conservativism of Ronald Reagan's "New Beginning" proposes: Abrogation of government obstacles and impediments to the "natural" flow of events in culture, the economy, and society; return to "states rights"; massive deregulation of the regulatory agencies (Federal Trade Commission, FTC, Federal Communications Commission, FCC, Nuclear Regulatory Commission, NRC, etc.); elimination of the minimum wage; expressed hostility toward the gay rights movement; return of prayer to school; reinstitution of capital punishment; end to school busing; eschewel of Equal Rights Amendment (ERA) total ignoring of demands for Women's Rights; an exhorbitant multi-billion dollar war-preparedness ("defense") budget; refusal to sponsor a National Health Insurance coupled with further neglect of Senior Citizens; further breaks, incentives and kick-backs, rebates and gratis (subsidies) for private corporations and American Multi-National Firms, and so on.

In the most reactionary and perhaps neo-facist, or at least neo-corporatist, nature of this ideological stream of thinking perpetuating racism, sexism, ageism, gay and class oppression we find direct danger in immediate repecussions of some of these ideas.

Reagan wants to scale-down or abolish regulation (which was originally set up to minimally safeguard and protect people and their environment) so that private enterprise can flourish and grow uninterrupted once again like "The Good Old Days" of "The Golden Age of The American Economy." The problem with the adaged "Good Old Days/Golden Age" propaganda argot is that no one really well remembers them except the corporate and multinational tycoons and magnates who were reaping unprecedented profits from ruthless exploitation and oppression.

Looming large over all this and as a prescriptive salvo for the artificial commerical-cultural quip "America's not gonna be pushed around anymore–a boldface lie and distortion cast in a reflection of the pitiful macho image of the John Wayne-Frank Sinatra-Lee A. Iacocca Bob Hope- Curtin Lemay-George Wallace-Ronald Reagan cognection. It is the prospect of global thermonuclear war. These old, tired (really insecure and uncertain) middle-aged white males whose movies, dreams, music, and entertainment reflect an absolutist and characteristic Manifest Destiny and American hegemonic cultural normative impulse.

The dreams of an unrestrained American Planetary Empire have been punctured by the now recognized fact–at least by most of the world's people–that there are more people and countries in the world than just the United States of America, which seems willing to sacrifice all and take all into a Dante's Nuclear War-Heat Hell of apocalypse if the world's people do not submit to its pathological patriarchal domination they peculiarly call "Democracy."

We can observe the same trend in the United Nations and other International Organizations that the more active nations are in these, especially from the "Third World," and the more "Pluralistic" or "Democratic" these institutions get, the less the U.S. Government wants to participate, because the U.S. can no longer dominate. Many votes find the U.S. in a distinct minority, usually only with Israel and South Africa. Even the European Economic Community (EEC) Common Market countries don't vote consistently and predictably as these three. The U.S. Government behaves like a child throwing a tantrum, crying to take the marbles and go home.

Thus, Daniel Patrick Moynihan's crybaby antics as American Ambassador to the United Nations were apprentice at national and social chauvinist actions portending the superchauvinism, racism, and sexism of Ronald Reagan & Co. At home and abroad the next four years will be a great and last-ditch attempt to turn back reason, progress, and democracy (that is, attempts to forge democracy for the first time).

From Monopoly, Capitalism, Imperialism, and Colonialism and the challenges to the previous monolithic U.S. hegemony and domination in a world thirsting for democracy and humanity, Ronald Reagan's simplistic thinking ("Hit it with a hammer" or "Bomb it") threatens domestic and world peace. The rapid deployment force setup by Carter will allow Reagan a strike force for foreign interventions and intrequers. Ted Kennedy's SB-1/S-1 proposal laid the groundwork for an increased domestic surveillance apparatus to be involved. The United States as become the Center of Counter-Revolution and reaction in the world today, and has perpetuated a false mythology and ideology that few people outside the confines of the U.S. believe. Even within the U.S. there is great disagreement, and disbelief.

Here "mythology" is language, speech, and communication; simpicity, the falsely obvious; distortion, paradox, untruth, instrumentation and masks. It is wedded to idols and phantoms; darkness, opaqueness, confoundment, obfucation, concealment and mystification.

The symbiosis of "myth" and "ideology" framing the Reagan "New Beginning" is a renaissance that constitutes the circle of classical conservativism. We have every reason to be more than merely amazed. We are, perhaps, contrary to Rozak's Aquarian Age, entering an Orwellian Age (of no return!)

It behooves us all–black and white, women and men, young and old, gay and straight, student and worker, to unite now to begin the struggles ahead in the next four years, lest the expressions of mythology and ideology return final circle and are to be taken for reality.

Police logs Mislead Readers

To the Editor:

Do you ever read police logs? Have you ever been arrested? Well, not only did I get arrested, but my name was in at least two papers. Think about it: think about the assumptions that are made when you read, "Woman arrested for forgery," or "Woman said to falsify drug order." What assumptions are created? Do you pursue or care about the other side of don't you think there is another side? Personally, I have been deeply affected by the victimization I received not only in the Collegian but in the Hampshire Gazette as well. I would like to propose that if the Collegian is to continue to print such information, they should present an accurate overview of the situation not just one side (i.e. the police log). After reading the article, "Woman arrested for forgery," anyone could assume that not only did I write the prescription, but stole the pad as well. It says nothing about me being approached or any other non fictional detail.

When I walked into Genovese drug store last Wednesday night I had no idea the prescription handed to me was fake. In that sense I was victimized, and I want to stress an important warning to anyone: If anyone ever approaches you and they are a sleek talker, think about what they say, and how they say it. If you are listening but not comprehending, do not follow through on an action.

Every reader must be aware that this type of reporting is, indeed, one sided and should be read with a critical eye. I feel strongly that it is very important for the Collegian if they are to continue printing the police log to illustrate as accurately as possible the total picture. You as a reader of this and any other paper should not just accept what you read or hear, but should look at the situation critically.

I would appreciate the Collegian presenting follow up stories on this issue of victimization, and only feedback from students and friends.

Universal Insanity

To the Editor:

How did things ever get this far? What should we expect to happen next after John Lennon, one of the greatest musicians of our time, is murdered outside his home? Do we really need another Lee Harvey Oswald clone? A man who the New York City Police have described as a "local screwball," has taken the life of a man who brought happiness to millions throughout the world. We love you John.

This Is Justice?

To the Editor:

In Oct. 1, 1980 my roommate and I filed a complaint against four people on my floor. A month and a half later, on Nov. 19, the hearing finally materialized. On Nov. 21, we received a notice that two out of the four offenders were found guilty of excessive noise. Here it is Dec. 7, and the noise continues.

Is this the way the judiciary system is designed to work? I must have been misinformed. I thought the judiciary was based on the premise of punishing offenders. As of today, we have not been informed of any impending action against the offenders, and we assume they have not either.

This semester has proven to be one of extreme aggravation and feelings of hopelessness. Time is a valuable commodity to all college students. Our original complaint has resulted in the wasted time of ourselves, the offenders, the ruling judicial board, and various members of the administration.

It seems a shame that all these hours have been spent fruitlessly. Apparently, all that the offenders have received is a figurative "slap on the hand." This tends to illustrate incompetence on the part of the administration, and is in direct opposition to the purpose of a judicial system.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Parody Week Applauded

To the Editor:

I would like to comment on the letters the Collegian has been getting on the parody of the Daily News. Being a resident of the Metropolitan area, I have been exposed to the style of the New York newspapers all my life.

If the people who complained about the headline, "Reds Set to Move," did their research, they would have found out that the headline was a perfect parody of the New York Daily News. The News has a habit of taking big words, and cutting them down to the fewest amount of letters. They turn president into pres, American into Yanks, and the Governor into Gov. So if you want to complain about the use of certain shortened terms, go to the source: The New York Daily News.

I personally would like to applaud the job the Collegian is doing on its parody week. The Daily News parody was especially good! Though the paper is usually shallow in its reporting, it sometimes takes some interesting chances. Don't stop because of a few thin skinned individuals.

Sensationalism Is Yellow Journalism

To the Editor:

I was amazed by the look of the Collegian today on Monday, Dec. 8 as most people who are familiar with the New York Daily News would have been. However, not only did the Collegian mirror the physical format of that newspaper, it went so far as to imitate the sensationalism so prevalent in the Daily News.

A case in point: the story of the in validation of the Sylvan area government election.

The headline above the article proclaimed "Ballots Stuffed by Sis May Nix Sylvan Vote." (Read it again, slowly) Going door to door in my dorm, copy of Collegians in hand, I took an informal poll. Out of 19 people approached, 19 answered my question, What does this say? by replying that someone's sister stuffed the ballot box. Reading the rest of the article, it was easy for most residents of the dorm to surmise just who "sis" is, as she happens to live here.

We are not talking about a college newspaper's parody of a big city paper, we are talking about "yellow journalism." Whether the connection between the words 'stuffed and stuffed' was intentional or not is irrelevant, the result was the same. The Collegian owes this woman an apology, as well as the University at large, for such a tacky attempt at experimentation with the college's newspaper.

Distinguished Teaching Award

To the Editor:

We are writing to clarify some foggy statements attributed to us in the December 1 Collegian article on the Distinguished Teaching Awards.

Our intention was to inform the University community of the new structure of the Distinguished Teaching Awards Committee, and of the significance of these awards which give recognition and financial reward to outstanding teachers. The article misrepresented both our statements and our intentions, which were certainly not to cast aspersions on past Distinguished Teaching Award Committee members nor to imply that students feel excellence in teaching is incompatible with knowledge in the teacher's field.

We did want to affirm that having a majority of students (rather than faculty) on the committee is a positive step towards guaranteeing that the awards reward excellence in teaching. Furthermore, we consider that command of one's subject is an integral part of distinguished teaching, just as important as the ability to communicate that knowledge effectively to students.

Campus Crusade Not a Cult

To the Editor:

It is one thing to question the methods of a religious organization. It is quite another thing and a serious accusation to label that organization a "cult." I am referring to a recent and rather lengthy letter you printed which had to do with a visit from a woman representing Campus Crusade for Christ.

For many years the word "cult" has been generally understood (by those within the historic Christian church) as follows. A cult is a religious group or organization which claims to be Christian in both and practice and yet denies or distorts some of the basic doctrines of historic Christianity, such as the doctrine of the Trinity or the doctrine of the deity of Christ. Usually, there is some deficient view of Jesus Christ, from the point of view of those within the mainline Christian denominations, which believe Him to be the Son of God.

To one cult He is some sort of "Divine Idea"; to another He is a created angel; to another He is one of many gods; to another He is one of many manifestations of God. Usually, for the cultist, there has been received some new vision or revelation of truth which must be received along with the Bible.

In recent years the word "cult" has connoted the idea of the Jim Jones type personality and bands of unthinking (perhaps brainwashed) rank and file members who are loyal to their leader no matter how neurotic he or she is. Therefore, in the minds of a great many people today, a cult is some new and radical religious group which also may be somewhat dangerous to the well being of our society.

Let me assure anyone interested that Campus Crusade for Christ cannot be called a "cult" by any of the above delinations. As to their faith and practice they are well within the mainstream of the historic Christian faith. Campus Crusade people can be found as members of and cooperating with mainstream Christian denominations all across this country. I have known a good many of them both here and in other states, and I am able to heartily vouch for the sincere and genuine character of these people.

It is suggested that "Crusade should be re-evaluated, at least by those on campus, to discover the true meaning and underlying purpose of its existence." Let me suggest that the answer to that matter can be summed up by the words of Jesus which are found in Mark 16:15, "Go into all the world and preach the gospel to all creation."

Crusade's purpose is as old as that great commission.

Burning Couch Found in Dorm

A student security employee removed and extinguished a smouldering sofa from an elevator in Kennedy Dormitory at 12:06 a.m. yesterday, police said. A scorched and smouldering rug was later found on the eighth floor lounge—where the $100 sofa is thought to have belonged, police said. There is an investigation into the matter, police said.

Smoke from a catch basin in the basement of James Dormitory in the Southwest Residential Area set off a smoke detector at 4:17 PM Tuesday, police said. The catch-basin housed shut-off valves for water pipes, they said.

A $150 tape deck was stolen from a car in lot 44 near the Sylvan Residential Area between November 23 and Tuesday, police said.

A University police officer found a stolen construction barrel and flashing light in the fourth floor lounge of Mackimmie Dormitory in the Southwest Residential Area.

Accident Occurs Due to Icy Roads

A two-car accident occurred yesterday morning at the corner of Lincoln Avenue and Fearing Street, police said.

A vehicle operated by Charles R. Emery, 20, of Amherst was traveling east of Fearing Street when it collided with a car traveling north on Lonedis Avenue operated by Rae A. Mellen, 59, also of Amherst, police said. Emery was unable to stop because of the icy roads, police said.

There were no injuries and no citations were issued.

Health Care Clinics Offered over Break

University Health Services will conduct their regularly scheduled contraception clinics until Thursday. During Wintersession, the clinics will be conducted once a week on Tuesdays at 2 p.m. in room 302 in the University Health Center.

Wart care sessions during Wintersession will meet on January 7 and 21, at 1 p.m., in room 302 in the health center.

Residents Arrested For Theft of XMas Tree

Two Amherst residents were arrested early yesterday morning in connection with the theft of a Christmas tree from the Amherst-Pelham Boy Scouts tree sale on North Pleasant Street, Amherst Police reported yesterday.

Police said Pamela Strong, 19, and Michael Roif, 23, both of 100 Colonial Village, were charged with larceny of under $100 after a Community Services Officer parked across the street allegedly saw them place the tree in their car. The officer called for a police cruiser and the pair was apprehended as they drove down Main Street, police said.

Five other people have been charged with the theft of threes from the same area in the past week, police reported.

Missing Woman Found Near Home

Mildred S. Brown, 72, a long-time Amherst resident, was found half a block from her house after a three hour police search early yesterday morning, Amherst police said.

Police said they had a report that she was missing about 3 a.m. yesterday morning from her Meadow Street home. Residents of her house, which is divided into apartments, said she has wandered off before but never for so long and never at night.

She was found lying in a stream in a hollow near her home at about 4 a.m. when James F. Neidlo IV, 16, reported he heard a woman moaning near his window. Police found Brown and she was transported to Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton where she was treated for exposure and is reported to be resting comfortably. Her condition is improving, a hospital spokesman said.

Seven police officers were in the search party, and the midnight shift was held over to assist in the search, police said.

XMas Tree Attracts Gathering

It was drizzling, a bit too warm for snow, when they lit the Christmas tree Tuesday night in Southwest. Marge Harlow sat there, on a wall in front of Lance, sheltered from the drizzle, and watched it all.

"We were hoping to get a few more people," said Harlow, a freshman from Coolidge Upper, and a member of the Southwest Assembly, which sponsored the event. "But, a lot of people are still watching Charlie Brown. It's a pretty good crowd, though."

Inside Hampden Dining Commons a couple hundred Southwest residents stood around prior to the lighting of the 30-foot tree, listening to the University Chorale sing religious carols, the words to which no one knew. A few kids had beers, some others drank coffee and ate cake.

"It's not just Christmas," Linda Kraft, a senior from 3QA, was saying. "This kind of idea—getting people together—would work anyway. I hope the media come, too, because they usually hang on the bad things. You never hear about the good things that go on up here."

The Southwest Assembly, a student-run organization, appropriated $883 to the President's Council for the whole thing. The tree, the lights, the refreshments, the craft show. Posters were put up, leaflets were handed out and each Southwest resident received a personal invitation in the mail.

"I got an invitation the other day, so I thought I'd come down and see what's going on," said Lynn LaValle, a sophomore, as she stood under red and green streamers strung across Hampden's ceiling.

Someone asked LaValle if she thought things like this help the University's image.

"The only people who think this place is a zoo are the people who don't live here," she said. "I went to Westfield State for a year and it's worse. But, you always see stories and hear things about UMass, and all that ZooMass stuff."

"The UMass image—whatever that is—is bad in-state, but it's good out of state," he said. "There's vandalism and all that on the weekends. But you've got to remember, this is the biggest campus around, too. This sort of thing is going to happen when you have all these people living together."

It was about nine o'clock when the crowd filed out of Hampden and gathered around the tree. Marge Harlow pulled a leg up and let her chin rest on her knee as she spoke.

"I think a lot of the bad image is in people's minds," she said. "People can say all they want, but this is a good school if you use it."

The tree was lit and a loud cheer went up from the 400 or so who stood around in the rain. Alvin and the Chipmunks blared out over a PA system and Marge Harlow spoke above the noise.

"I admit Southwest has a really bad image, but it's a nice place to live," she said. "People look at me when I tell them I live here and they say 'Wow, you're from Southwest? You look like a Northwest type.' I mean, c'mon, what's a 'type' person, anyway?"

Some fireworks were tossed out a window and a sparkler came down, bouncing near a few people who stood under the tree.

"You see that?" Marge Harlow asked, shaking her head. "There's always a few people who are going to act like that. That's Southwest all over. You have all these people out here, having a good time, and a couple of idiots do something like that."

Someone asked Marge Harlow if a little thing like this, getting a bunch of people together for a couple of hours to sing songs and stand around a tree can change what a lot of people think about this University.

"I don't know if it changes anything," Marge Harlow said. "But it helps."

And then it began to snow.

Red Sox trade Burleson, Hobson

By Ralph Bernstein
AP Sports Writer

DALLAS — California and Boston completed a five player deal at baseball's winter meetings last night in which the Angels sent Carney Lansford, Mark Clear and Rick Miller to the Red Sox for infielders Rick Burleson and Butch Hobson.

Lansford, 23, a third baseman, hit .264 in 86 games with five home runs and 34 runs batted in for the Angels last season. He is considered an outstanding fielder.

Clear, 24, is a right-handed pitcher who posted an 11-11 record with a 3.30 earned run average in 206 innings for the Angels. He struck out 105 and walked 81.

Miller, 30, returns to Boston, where he played out his option and signed with California on Dec. 22, 1977. The veteran outfielder hit .274 in 129 games for the Angels in 1980.

Burleson, a 29-year old shortstop batted .278 in 155 games with eight home runs and 51 RBI for the Red Sox last season, while Hobson, also 29 the Boston third baseman, averaged .228 in 93 games with 11 homers and 39 RBI.

Lansford was selected by the Angels in the third round of the June 4, 1973 free agent draft. He was played both third base and shortstop, appearing in 121 games in 1978 and posting a .294 batting average. In 1979, he settled in at third base, where he played 157 games and hit .287 with 79 RBI and 19 home runs.

Clear was chosen in the eighth round of the 1974 free agent draft by the Philadelphia Phillies organization, which released him in 1975. Two months later, he was signed by California. He appeared in 52 games in 1978, compiling an 11-5 record with a 3.63 ERA.

Miller came up with the Red Sox in 1971 and played with them seven seasons before playing out his option. He has a lifetime batting average of .265. The ugh fielder is the brother-in-law of Red Sox catcher Carlton Fisk.

Burleson, the American League All-Star shortstop in 1977 and '79, originally was signed by the Minnesota Twins organization in the eighth round of the 1968 free agent draft. He came to the Red Sox two years later in the secondary phase of the draft. He joined Boston in 1974 and has been the club's regular shortstop ever since. He has a major league lifetime batting mark of .275. His best season was in 1977, when he hit .290 and drove in 52 runs.

Hobson joined the Red Sox organization after he was picked in the eighth round of the 1973 free agent draft. He moved up through the minors before joining the parent club in 1976, where he compiled a .256 lifetime batting mark. His best year was 1977, when he hit 30 home runs and batted in 112. In 1979, he collected 26 home runs and 93 RBI.

Hobson was the Red Sox' regular third baseman until last season when he lost the job to rookie Glenn Hoffman. With Burleson going to California, Hoffman most likely will move to shortstop and Lansford will take over at third.

Hobson is a former University of Alabama quarterback.

A solitary tree stands underneath a winter sun. Mahar Auditorium and the School of Business Administration are in the background.

The Foreign Report

The World

Mao's Widow Appears on TV

PEKING (AP) — Jiang Qing, on trial for alleged crimes in China's Cultural Revolution, was given her longest exposure yet on Chinese television yesterday. She told a rambling story on rising ideological work at the urging of her husband, the late Chairman Mao Tse-tung.

Jiang also was shown interrupting two witnesses and arguing briefly with a female judge who told Jiang that her testimony was irrelevant.

It was the first time the 67- year-old former Shanghai actress, once China's most powerful woman, was shown talking about Mao during the trial, which began nearly three weeks ago. Foreign reporters are barred in case state secrets are discussed.

It was reported Jiang would defend herself by arguing she acted on instructions from Mao, who is highly revered here as the founder of Communist China when the Communists defeated the Nationalist Chinese in 1949. Mao died in September 1976. Shortly after his death, Jiang and the other members of the so-called Gang of Four were arrested.

Chinese leaders have emphasized a distinction between Mao's "mistakes" and the "crimes" of Jiang and the others on trial.

First National Elections in Uganda

KAMPALA, Uganda (AP) — Nearly 5 million Ugandans, eager for a new government after a decade of dictatorship and turmoil, started voting yesterday in a chaotic climax to the first national elections in 18 years.

Former President Milton Obote, ousted in 1971 by dictator Idi Amin, was attempting a political comeback. His Uganda People's Congress was favored over the Roman Catholic based Democratic Party of Paul Saemogerere in an apparently close race.

Voting was extended to a second day because of a heavy turnout and delays of many hours in equipping polling stations. Election officials announced that polls would be open again on Thursday and vote counting was to start after polls closed Thursday afternoon.

Polling agents were instructed to stand guard over ballot boxes during the night to prevent tampering.

The Democratic Party said it objected to the extension of voting because it gave Obote's party and its government backers a chance to "indulge in malpractices."

Voters were searched at 5,000 polling stations and in Obote's Kampala district the presiding officer told voters: "No guns, no party cards, no grenades — no nothing."

The initial voting was generally good humored and peaceful, despite a campaign marred by violence and charges of intimidation and fraud, and despite a lack of ballot boxes, ballots and voter lists at hundreds of polling stations.

Soviet Arms Sales to Third World Up

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Soviet Union increased its sales of arms to Third World countries from $2.5 billion in 1978 to $8.4 billion last year, with most of the weaponry going to Arab countries, the Central Intelligence Agency said in a report released yesterday.

The report, concentrated on arms sales to less developed, non-communist countries around the world and did not give details of Soviet arms sales to countries that do not fit that description.

"In 1979, communist economic and military aid programs continued as a major means of penetrating the military establishments and influencing the governments of key Third World countries," the CIA report said. "Arms sales rebounded from a five year low."

The CIA said the Arab nations accounted for nearly 36 percent of the 1979 Soviet contracts for military hardware. The report said the equipment being supplied to those countries is of higher sophistication and therefore costs more than that sold in past years.

"Brisk Soviet sales in 1979 were largely the product of heightened political unrest across north Africa and the Middle East, the CIA report said. "The Arab states accounted for nearly 90 percent of Soviet arms sales. Moscow concluded major new arms agreements with Iraq for additional T-72 tanks and MiG-25 fighter aircraft. Syria also arranged for new arms."

In contrast to the rise in Soviet arms sales last year, East European arms sales fell to a six year low of $250 million, and China had only $140 million in new agreements, the CIA reported.

Soviet Cosmonauts Return to Earth

MOSCOW (AP) — Three Soviet cosmonauts returned to Earth yesterday after performing a series of repairs and test aboard the orbiting Soviet space station Salyut-6 during a 13-day flight, the Soviet news agency Tass reported.

Cosmonauts Leonid Kizim, Oleg Makarov and Gennady Strekalov were reported in "perfect condition" after making a soft landing in the Central Asian Republic of Kazakhstan.

It was the sixth manned space flight by the Soviet Union this year and the first of a trio of cosmonauts since June 1971.

The Soyuz T-3 spaceship is the third in a series of newly designed spaceships described as improved models of the Soyuz capsule, the mainstay of the Soviet space program since 1967.

The new capsule features solar batteries, an onboard computer, more efficient maneuvering rockets and cabin improvements to provide greater comfort for the cosmonauts. Tass also said improvements in the field of microelectronics made it possible to make onboard equipment lighter and more reliable.

U.S. Allies Plan Response to Soviet Move Against Poland

WASHINGTON (AP) — The United States and its allies are weighing "possible collective responses" to any Soviet intervention in Poland, including a cutback in East-West trade, credits and technology, administration officials said Wednesday.

The measures contemplated are all non-military in nature. Privately, Carter administration officials have ruled out the use of force against the Soviets in retaliation for any action against Poland.

But U.S. officials stressed yesterday that the administration's overriding aim is to convince the Kremlin that the liberalization achieved by Polish workers under the country's Communist rule is not a threat to the Soviet Union.

"One of the key and consistent points the administration has been making over recent weeks is that the United States is not fomenting or exploiting Poland's internal difficulties in any way at all," an administration official said.

These officials, asking not to be identified, complained that leaks to the media about contingency planning, which has been under way for months, could add to a feeling in Moscow that the United States, West Europe and China are working together to encircle the Soviet Union.

It is clear, however, that U.S. consultations with its allies were begun in when Polish workers struck to force the government in Warsaw to authorize creation of an independent labor federation.

The discussions, which involved trips to West Europe by State Department officials, are continuing at a high level this week at a meeting of North Atlantic Treaty Organization ministers in Brussels.

A joint communique to be adopted after a windup, secret session on Friday is expected to emphasize that all 15 countries are concerned about the Soviet military buildup on the Polish border and the threat that armed Soviet intervention would pose to the stability of Europe.

Brezhnez Offers U.S. a Five-Point-Plan

By Gene Kramer
Associated Press Writer

NEW DELHI, India — Soviet President Leonid I. Brezhnev offered the United States and other countries yesterday a five-point plan to guarantee peace in the turbulent Persian Gulf in place of the "Carter Doctrine" for U.S. defense of the oil-rich area.

In a major policy speech concluding a state visit to India, Brezhnev rejected Western claims of a "Soviet threat" in the gulf and called on the United States, China, Japan and others to join Moscow in reasoning force, military bases and nuclear weapons from the area.

Brezhnev told the Indian Parliament that, "In contrast to the imperialist doctrine with regard to the Persian Gulf countries, we proposea doctrine of peace and security."

In Washington, State Department spokesman Jack Cannon said the issue of military withdrawal from the gulf would have to be addressed by the Reagan administration when it takes office Jan. 20.

"To the extent that the Soviet president was talking about maintaining peace in the Persian Gulf, our interests would coincide. We are highly supportive of maintaining peace in the Persian Gulf and elsewhere," Cannon said.

Just Wait 'Till Next Year

Weather changes frequently on these early days of December as the inconsistency of November tries to even things out within, so as to move ahead to the steady chill of winter with streams of confidence.

And in the wonderful world of collegiate sports, the period of change between fall and winter athletics, working itself out into a new routine of events, brings to mind many thoughts of sports philosophy. For in sports, the one constant assurance, one that won't go away no matter what went wrong on the field on any particular day, is that lo and behold, (trumpets please!) there is a next season. Just wait, (you think walking away from your last match with your dignity fully intact) until next year!

Only the senior with full knowledge that this was the last season at UMass, who easily carts away mountains of beautiful memories, cannot feel the strength that this thought brings. This confidence that stems from the calendar is one that carries itself to all levels and perspectives of athletics.

To the fan, it is the binding net of hope, what brings someone to talk about recruits and on the professional level, to discuss trades and free agency (and Don Zimmer and so on). It enables the fan to measure progress in specific areas and to count factors such as youth and determination in team evaluations. "Wait 'til next year," as the famous proverb goes (supposedly dating back to baseball teams like the old Brooklyn Dodgers), and you can feel the tremors of it beating and pulsating (from the hearts of loyalists everywhere) from coast to coast.

And as the fan proudly carries his confidence with the knowledge that the continuous ring of sport will come his way again only too soon, so too do sports coaches all. Perhaps here it is all the more obvious and easy to examine, as the coach measures progress with the full knowledge and hope that the putential he or she sees now will expose itself in that incredible "next year" (or else that coach may have their employment in jeopardy, making the concept more one of survival).

To the athlete, the fan, or even the coach, this knowledge is the interlinking force driving all together with (slightly ultraviolet) rays of anticipation and hope. The knowledge that, yes, things are in a pattern and are consistent from a broad perspective which allows us to write without any fear that thoughts may become obsolete. This "wait 'til next year" idea is one that is so all-encompassing that it leans on being completely eternal, and beyond the scope of day to day reality.

Athletic seasons will continue to come and go even as we move on into the future. And as things even out now (cruising on into finals) this view will burn within us in different aspects of our lives in many varying degrees. Yes, New England will always have a winter season and yes, next fall, most of us will be sitting in similar depths of despair (formulas and words rattling your brains, your mind wanting relief) brooding over dreaded finals. There will be another chance, another season in which to let loose and "go for it."

Wait 'til next year, folks, the times upcoming have promise.

Roll on.

Gymnasts at NU

By Sharon Pannozzo
Daily Collegian Staff Writer

This Friday the women's gymnastics team will travel to Northeastern University for its second meet of the season. The contest is slated to begin at 7 p.m. Northeastern, a new addition to the gymwomen's schedule, fields a Division I squad. UMass Coach Virginia Evans described the program as "still developing," and expects her squad to gain its first victory.

In the UMass Invitational, their first outing of the season, the gymwomen placed a disappointing third with a team score of 123.80. The team was plagued by execution problems which accounted for the loss of about seven points.

For its second meet, the squad has established individual, as well as team goals. "Our basic goal is to improve the teamscore in each event. Optimally, we would like to score 34.00 in the vault, 34.00 on the beam, 32.00 on the bars, and 32.00 in the floor exercise," Evans said. This would give the squad a teamscore of 132.00 A 132.00 score would have given UMass a victory in the Invitational.

Against Northeastern, Karen Ginsburg, Kathy Mathews, Michelle Santagate, and Heidi Milender will be going all-around. This is only a tentative lineup however, as Ginsburg has the flu and Milender an abdominal injury.

Freshman Robin Lowe, unable to go all-around because of an abdominal injury, will compete in two, possibly three events. Evans is also hoping that Chris Wilson will be able to compete. Specialist Karen Knapp, who had the squad's best performance on the beam with an 8.45 score in the Invitational, will see action, as will bar specialist Chris Paul.

Karen McComber scored 21 points to spark the offense and Andrea Blackwell pulled down five rebounds to pace the defense, as Bishop's University of Quebec downed the UMass women's basketball team, 66-55, last night before a small crowd at the Cage.

McComber, a 5-11 forward from Victoria, British Columbia, hit 10 of 18 from the floor and one from the foul-line to lead all scorers and spark the undermanned Lady Gaiter squad.

Bishop's, which played the game with just seven players, had four players who could not make the trip due to illness.

"It's one of those things; four of my girls are sick with the flu," Bishop's head coach Wayne Hussey said. "I'm proud of them (the girls that played); they played well."

Bishop's, which held a slim 28-24 halftime lead, quickly upped the advantage to eight as McComber tossed in two straight 12-footers from the left side in the first two minutes of the second half.

The visitors from the North then took charge as they outscored UMass, 18-12, in the next eight minutes to take a commanding 14-point lead. Bishop's scoring spurt was capped off by three Theresa Grant jumpers, a Denise Dignard layup and a Mccomber free-throw, which brought the Quebecois a 52-38 edge with 8:30 left to play.

UMass, which shot a disappointing 24-58 from the floor (.413), made brief comeback attempts, but could not pull any closer than eight points for the rest of the contest. Nadine Jackson, a freshman from Amherst, who netted nine points, headed the Minutewomen's brief resurgence, along with Sherry Collins who scored all of her four game points in the last minute of play.

The Minutewomen's comeback attempt, however, was stalled when Dignard connected on three foul shots and Sue Hylland swished a twisting layup.

McComber, who was spotty at times on defense, came through on offense for the Gaiters who upped their seasonal mark to 12-1.

"She (McComber) has been cold lately, but she got back on track tonight," Hussey said. "She's a good shooter, but she loses her concentration on defense at times."

The teams got off to a slow start in the first half. The first points of the game were not registered until the 18:40 mark when Grant popped in one of her patented short jumpers. Then, after Blackwell

Wrestlers Slip By Mass. Maritime

Allen Pins Felecetta to Break a Tie

By Sue Bridgman
Daily Collegian Staff Writer

It was much closer than expected but the UMass wrestling team, defeated Mass. Maritime Academy 27-21 last night at Boyden gym.

All tied up going into the last match at 21 apiece, it was up to heavyweight John Allen to gain the victory for the matmen.

Allen did just that, pinning his Maritime opponent, Rich Felecetta with 54 seconds left in the second period.

Ahead 7-1, Allen wasted no time in taking down his lighter opponent. "I was confident that I could take him," said Allen. "He was lighter than me."

UMass got the advantage early, when Mass. Maritime forfeited the 118 pound class, but MM took the 126 class with a pin.

UMass then came back to take the next three matches to bring the score to 18-6, UM.

Doug Johnson, at 134, cheered on by the crowd, battled to an 8-8 tie with Gary Bennett of Maritime. Johnson got the win on riding time (had control of the match).

In the 142 pound class, Alan Levy wasted no time putting the points on the board. Levy racked up the score to 10-0, before pinning his Maritime opponent Joe Klempa with 34 seconds remaining in the second period.

Greg McDonald (150) had a tougher tie, but hung in there for a close 7-6, UMass victory.

Inexperience hurt UMass in the 158 class. Scott McQuaide faced Scott Bateman of Maritime and was quickly pinned at 1:36.

"Our best wrestlers (Dana Rasmussen and Mike Carroll) were not wrestling tonight and that may have hurt us," Amato said.

In a seesaw match between Chris Syocarka (MM) and Dave McEntee (UM), Mass. Maritime pulled out an 8-7 win in the 167 class. McEntee was trailing 6-5, when he gained two points on a reversal with only 40 seconds remaining. UMass fans went wild but the celebration was short-lived. Syocarka pulled out a reversal of his own with seconds left to take the match 8-7. This brought Mass. Maritime to within three points.

Dave Gosselli, at 177 had a tough time in this match, being pinned by Shawn Byrnes (MM) in the second period at 4:72.

Bob Clark stayed close for UMass in the 190 class, edging Bill Hoefer 2-1. Clark had a tough time holding on to his opponent who kept edging back, and to top it off, the referee called stalling on Clark. The match ended at one apiece but Clark gained a point for riding time.

Clark's victory tied it up at 21 and it was left to the heavyweights to decide the outcome.

Allen's pin game UMass the win and brought their record to 2-0-1.

"I just wanted to build up a lead, and take it from there," said Allen of his match.

Over all Coach Amato was disappointed with the match. "We wrestled poorly," said Amato, but added "a win is a win."

Force II Zaps Gunners

By Stephen Freker
Daily Collegian Staff Writer

Something was definitely wrong here.

Max Jones, Wilbur Jackson, and Garry Pearson were all playing, but Pete DiTommaso was on the sideline bench, reduced to the role of cheerleader. Herb Newland was there too. He wasn't practicing his kicks though, instead he was trying to keep a small yellow balloon afloat with his head, soccer style.

Another strange item was the fact that they were all in the Boyden Gym wearing basketball sneakers instead of running around Alumni Stadium in their cleats.

Football might have seemed the order of the day here, especially if you watched the two games that were played. However, basketball was the game in question Force II, comprised of Jackson, Pearson and Jones, beat a tough opponent, The Gunners, twice in the final championship round of the men's intramural three-on three basketball tournament in an extremely physical, foul plagued series at Boyden Gymnasium last night.

This was the second consecutive crown for the Force II trio. They got by Ray Murphy's team in last year's championship game, beating the P.W.'s 12-10 in a hard fought overtime thriller.

"Three-on-three is a double-elimination tournament. The games consist of 11 points, win by two," Mike Waldron, head intramural official said. "Force II lost their first game because they used an illegal player and were forced into the loser's bracket early, they won the rest of their games(10) to make it to the finals. The Gunners were undefeated in the winners bracket (8-0)."

Force II had to beat the Gunners twice to successfully defend their crown and they made it known early that this would be a tough series. Game one was very physical from the outset, too physical for a couple of the Gunners players who exchanged words with Jackson and Jones. Garry Pearson got into the picture soon after with some verbal admonishments to the crowd of about 25 who were taunting players on both sides.

After these preliminary distractions, Pearson and Jones began to effectively demonstrate that each was quite adept at a sport other than football. Jones kept pulling down strong rebounds and scoring on outside jumpers, and a couple of easy layups set up by Pearson assists. Jones had six points in the 11-7 Force Two win. Bill Labelle had four for the Gunners.

"If I was calling fouls," Marc Thompson, an intramural official/observer said. "Everyone on both teams would have fouled out after the first game."

Players call their own fouls in three-on-three hoop. Officials are there to mediate if there is a problem with a call.

After a timeout between games and a pep talk by DiTommaso to Force II, the deciding contest was played. This game turned out to be the Wilbur Jackson show. He dominated on both the defensive and offensive boards and showed that he could go to the hoop and gun from outside. His 6 for 12 shooting led Force II to the win and their second three-on-three championship.

The Gunners were no pushovers in this series. Jack Garrity played some pretty tough "D" on Pearson in both games and got some clutch boards in the second game to go along with his excellent seeing-eye passes to teammates Labelle and Rich Mead, for easy layups.

The Exploitation of Dead Heroes

By Jim Moran

The death of former Beatle John Lennon Monday has, and not without justification, made a profound impact on the generations of fans nurtured on the music of the Fab Four, as well as the solo efforts of this talented singer-songerwriter. But the occurence of this rock musician's passing also lends itself as a symptom of a mass media malady that is increasingly evident in this age of high technology and quick communication — the "cash is on the corpse" syndrome.

No sooner was Lennon dead then we saw and heard the deluge of reports waiting to feed the appetite of those bent on getting the most mileage out of tragedy. "It was six shots." "No, it was three." "Mr. Lennon was shot in the back." "The ex-Beatle expired after he was shot in the chest," depending on which network you were tuned in to.

Then came the inevitable "rush to the record racks" in a presumptuous, last-ditch attempt to "get a piece of the rock," by some who maybe never owned a Beatles LP, much less a Lennon solo album. And the radio stations were, of course, flooded with requests to play the dead man's music.

But Lennon's career is not the only one to be exploited by the culprits of commercialization and the sentiment vultures. The Doors, nine years after lead singer Jim Morrison's death, have never been more popular, due in large part to the publication of the critically disclaimed biography No One Gets Out of Here Alive. Elektra-Asylum Records has just released an anthology LP that has risen so fast in the charts as to make one believe The Doors are still an active and creative force in our

Cheering For Your Team

By Eric Janszen

There is a joke about necrophilia being socially acceptable if practiced between consenting adults. If that's funny, then so is the relationship carried on between the American print media and its readers — as described by Noam Chomsky.

Dr. Chomsky, noted first for his pioneering work in linguistics more than ten years ago, has more recently become known as one of the most scholarly critics of the print media.

In the two volume book, The Washington Connection and Third World Fascism: The Political Economy of Human Rights (see review, page 13), which he and Edward Herman authored, Dr. Chomsky carefully outlines and exhaustively documents the performance of the print media during the Vietnam War.

Since that period, stories on American activities in the Middle East, Latin America and all over the world have appeared in the American press. Its record of news supression and obfuscation raises serious questions about the accuracy and sufficiency of coverage of such events as UMass Band member points the way to Washington.

Band On the Run

The UMass Marching Band is one of seven collegiate bands chosen to participate in the Presidential Inaugural Parade to be held Jan. 20 in Washington, D.C., Director George Parks announced Wednesday.

"It's great. I never expected it," was the reaction of baritone player Peter Holley.

The parade will be held as part of President elect Reagan's inauguration day program. Although traditionally one band from each state is chosen, the parade committee's desire for brevity in the program necessitated the limiting of bands.

"We thought one band out of each state would be chosen," baritone player Mark Wade said, "but when we heard only seven in the country, and we were one, it was unbelievable."

Eric Sears, trombone player and publicity manager, says a brief portfolio containing pictures and newspapers of the band to Washington in November. Although he considered chances good of being chosen to represent Massachusetts, he admits the selection a surprise.

Bands and the other university bands performing will be from Ohio State, Arizona State, University of Tennessee, Southern University (Baton Rouge), University of South Dakota, and Texas.

The band plans to gather in Amherst on Saturday, January 17 to practice the routine, consisting of music by Chuck Mangione and from "The Sound of Music" and "Godspell". On Sunday, they will travel to Washington, and continue practicing through Monday. Arrangements are being made for the band to perform for alumni and friends in Washington on either that day or Monday night.

Reportedly tickets can also be found on Monday for some quick sight-seeing. Snowstorm. The band will march in the parade on Tuesday and return to Amherst that night.

Enthusiasm among members is fantastic, added Sears. He said almost 200 persons in the 180-member band is planning to attend.

The Student Assembly appointed Steven Masiello to the newly created position of Information Coordinator in their final meeting of the semester last night.

Masiello will act as liason between the assembly, the Southwest Community Concern, and southwest radio station WMAS.

He will also supervise the flow of information from the assembly and the Southwest concern to be broadcast over Southwest's radio station WMAS.

The assembly appropriated $200 to pay a member of the assembly's Executive Committee one stipe on campus during the winter break to work with the University administration. Such allocations have been made by the assembly in the past, said Steve Fredricks, SPIA Communication Coordinator.

The SPIA also allocated $200 to the UMass Chess Club to finance their participation in a national chess tournament later this month.

The allocation was recommended by SPIA Treasurer Steven Zudjas, who said the chess club had an "excellent chance of winning" the tournament. The allocation was made with the stipulation that the chess club refund any winnings from the tournament to the assembly proportional to the amount granted.

In other business, SPIA co-president Kevin Mangan praised the efforts of SPIA members who helped put on the Southeast Holiday Festival. Mangan said the festival went well, saying that he got "very positive feedback from the community/ administration."

Mangan went on to praise the assembly as a whole for their efforts throughout the semester, saying it has "shown a lot of enthusiasm," which he called, "100 percent improvement over last year's assembly."

Counselor Positions Open

Applications are now being accepted for student counselor positions in the 1981 Summer New Students' Program. The Program will operate from June 7 through July 24, 1981. Eleven sessions for first year students will be held, along with four transfer programs.

Training sessions for the 30 selected counselors will be late next semester and the week of June 1 through June 6. All positions require residence in an assigned residence hall and meals in the dining commons, but the nine week period, Summer Counseling positions require full time participation. Summer School "courses cannot be taken.

Also needed is one movie specialist with working knowledge of slide and movie projection, sound and public address systems.

Qualifications for counselor positions include successful work experience, a genuine attitude toward University life, knowledge regarding academic course planning, high energy level, a willingness to accept job performance standards and to attend the Spring training sessions.

Interested and qualified students may obtain an application from the Student Development and Counseling Center, 328 Berkshire House. Applications must be returned on or before 5 February 16, 1981. Selections will be announced during Spring break.

Black Affairs

Kwanza Celebration

"We draw from tradition our culture foundation of values and institutions. But we realize that we cannot become activists and seek to return to a totally African past while being both in America as well as in the present. We also realize that we cannot totally transplant African Culture in an American context, therefore we must adjust our traditions to fit and facilitate our movement in America," said Baraka Sun Karenga.

Maulana Ron Karenga in his elaborate for Black cultural nationalism initiated a holiday called "KWANZA." Kwanza is considered a holiday of legacy and tradition. It is an African American holiday adapted from African cultures and values.

Kwanza is literally defined as the first fruit from the harvest. The Kwanza celebration begins December 26 (Sunday) 1. The objective of Kwanza is completing, evaluating, and learning from the old year and preparing and looking forward to the new year. During the Kwanza celebration, the Black families are being educated, strengthened, unified, until each individual is prepared to deal in the society.

Each day of the Kwanza is given a name from the Nguzo Saba. The Nguzo Saba is the Seven Principles. Each day is named respectively: Umoja, Unity; Kujichagulia, Self Determination; Ujima, Collective Work and Responsibility; Ujamaa, Cooperative Economics; Nia, Purpose; Kuumba, Creativity; Imani, Faith.

During Kwanza no negative thoughts or acts should manifest as people fill the air with positive vibes and love towards their families and friends. People share their home, food and music in African traditional way. During Kwanza people reinforce their principles and at the same time illustrate and teach something of value to the new generation. This will give the children a positive self image of their family, strengthen their character, and inform them of their black history.

On midnight, December 31, the Kwanza closes. Inspire the family and friends by lighting the 7th candle (or black candle) and rejoicing as they sing and dance (people dispersed). On the last day, Zawadi (presents) can be given to the children. Such gifts are books for knowledge, wisdom and understanding or something made by parents.

The Nguzo Saba, seven principles, followed during Kwanza provides a much needed Black value system in America. We don't only have these principles during Kwanza but also in the principles of The Lumumba, commissioner acted for young Black World people, and the seven Seven Principles by Sweet Baby in the Book.

In summer, Kwanza provides strength for black people in America. Alabama is coordinating the efforts of the five colleges to have a Kwanza Celebration. On December 13, Friday, at Hampshire College it will be 6pm Night. There will be dance, music, athletics and swimming. It will be held at the Robert Crown Center from 10 p.m. - until. On Saturday, December 13, at the New Africa House there will be an all day event from 12 noon - until. There will be a series of lectures and workshops dealing with Kwanza and the Seven Principles and followed by the traditional Kwanza Feast.

Management's Still Mad

Tension is still high between Amherst Nursing Home union organized workers and management even though workers received their contract over two and a half months ago.

Some of the 55 workers who struck last September said they received a great deal of harassment from both management of the home and workers who did not strike.

The harassment came mostly in two forms: an increased number of warningslips were issued and workers did not receive incoming calls, said Linda L. Ed- wards, laundry worker.

"I've worked at the nursing home foralmost three years, and in that time I never saw anyone get a warning slip, now I'm see- ing them all the time," said Edwards.

Edwards said one worker, Susan Goldstein, was fired the day after she returned to work after the strike. But management did not follow the correct grievance procedure when firing her Edwards said.

Susan E. Kovacevic, administrator of the home, later offered beliefthatEdwards said this is an example of the type of atmosphere they are working in.

Edwards said she met with Kovacevic a "couple of times" in the last months, and when she asked why the workers were be- ing treated with such hostility, Kovacevic said "Farghetaboutabout time".

Edwards said she said the union let unions with said maintenance workers who struck did nothing that we gained bargaining. it was just something they had to do to survive.

The atmosphere at the home will not return to "normal" says that there has been a strike. Dawn L. Bay, housekeeper at the home said.

"It happened and you can never truly forget it. I only hope that one day people will be able to understand so-and why we were on strike."

"Such parties would have become self-fundsupport," Jay Fenner of the Union, his both and Hayes law firm, from Springfield who are attorneys for the nursing home said. Fenner said the tension between management and workers in typical after strikes and it should disappear soon.

The 55 workers walked out September 22 for six days after five months of unsuc- cessful bargaining. Their major demands were for union recognition and severance pay.

Prior to the strike, over half the workers received minimum wage and the average pay was $3.35 an hour. With the new con- tract, effective through May 8 1982, they will receive a pay raise of 55 cents per hour now, a total increase of $1.15 per hour over the next two years.

The workers have an "agency shop" where an incoming employee has the choice of joining the union and paying union dues, or not joining the union and instead contributing money to a charity. The workers also received a union approved method of firing employees and increase vacation eligibility.

Beth Edwards and Bay said the strike was a success, despite the increased harassment on the job. The strike may have been shortened by the strong local support.

"If there had been only workers out onthe picket line, we would still be there to- day," Edwards said.

Presser, the home's attorney, said the strike was not shortened by local support, or any community pressure.

Bruce Laurie, assistant professor of American Labor History at the University of Massachusetts said, historically employers have had a tendency to harass workers after a strike. Before the Wagner Act of 1935, leaders of a strike would usual- ly be fired or laid-off sometime after the strike. New harassment of workers must be more subtle to be within the law Laurie said. The subtle harassment towards the workers at the Amherst Nursing Home is typical of today's post strike conditions, he added.

Amherst nursing home strike supporter

Although conditions have improved recently, harassment of union organized workers continues, nursing home employee Edwards said.

The residence of the home, a housekeeper, are not affected by the str- ike, nor do they harass workers Bay said.

Both Bay and Edwards agree the nursing home's atmosphere has changed and will never be the same.

Who Are The Good Guys?

Dear Editor:

We've just been through a presidential election year. The candidates held heated debates on the "major issues" facing Americans in 1980. We heard about the economy, interest rates, taxes, energy and, most of all, defense. We were told that the nation must "beef up" its defense arsenal to keep the Russians, "the bad guys" in check. After all, look what happened in Afghanistan, they propped up an unpopular and oppressive regime that violated the rights of the common man. America must remain that sparkling tower of strength that ensures the existence of freedom and democracy.

We heard very little about El Salvador, the Republic of Korea, the Philippines, Nicaragua under Somoza, and even under the Shah — all oppressive regimes who are presently supported by the United States. Little was heard during the election year about the violations of basic human rights, torture and murder which are commonplace under such regimes. Such "minor details" are overlooked as we envision ourselves as pawns in the colossal chess game of military and economic strategy.

The murder of archbishop Romero and 4000 other people in El Salvador this year was not enough. It took the brutal murders of four American women missionaries to generate enough outrage in this country to suspend military and economic aid to the junta in El Salvador.

It had the good fortune to spend three weeks last summer observing Maryknoll missionaries at work in South America. Their perception of the value of the individual and his culture, their quiet love for the poor and oppressed, and their special first hand insight into the problems faced by people around the globe, made me realize how utter arrogance or naivete it is for American had about issues of human rights abroad. The cause of loss of four such dynamic and dedicated individuals must be felt and reflected upon by each one of us.

It is greatly disturbing to me that the Reagan administration plans to take a more "realistic" approach toward American support of regimes such as the one in El Salvador. Such an approach can only lead to more brutal killings, more suffering, more anguish. It makes me wonder who the "bad guys" are after all. The only "realistic" approach we can and must opt for involves compassion and consideration of how our decisions will affect the dignity of the individual.

Help Spread The Holiday Cheer

Dear Editor:

The third annual Udall-Amherst Globe Santa Fund is underway! The Paladium contributors are turned over to the Globe Santa Fund, a fund organized and administered by The Boston Globe. The fund is used to provide toys, and more importantly, hope to the poor, neglected or otherwise forgotten children this holiday season. We realize that due to academic pressure your time is limited. We are requesting, however, that each of you find time in these next two weeks to assist in this important cause. Please call and find out what you can do. Help is needed in everything from stuffing a letter on the commuter to being Santa himself. The phone numbers to call are: 549-3130 or 549-0240. Information and sign up sheets are in room 420 Student Union Building. This is a campus-wide project that needs your time and energetic support.

Lesson Remembered

Dear Editor:

"All you need is love
Love is all you need"
Sings the state prophet.
Though he tried to tell us over and over that the hate-filled, disease ridden world could be a better place if only we tried—and he did.
"Imagine all the people living in peace"
Yes, you were say that I'm a dreamer
But I'm not the only one
I hope someday you'll join us and the world will live as one."
He pleaded his cause,
And they called him traitor, radical, freak—
Every word they knew
He'd no need, and yet they could still be found humming his songs on spring filled days when the world did, indeed, seem a beautiful place, thinking before things, and not only for himself, they paused at him, his differences, his hopes, and his dreams.
Here on the streets of New York, stalling a voice that sang
"Give peace a chance."
He killed, he cruelly did.
Blasts took the gentle performer at times with the magical voice he was a part of.
He founded the group that revolutionized music, gave a lost generation a birth.
He was private, unbelieving, aloof to the public but he gave of himself in the music he put forth, and the music was of the times and yet a timeless
"I hear you know it ain't easy
You know how hard it can be
The way things are going
They're going to crucify me."
And so ends a life of a man who gave more than we knew—for prophets are not rarely hunted in their own kingdom.
John Winston Ono Lennon,
Singer, composer, musician, human being and singing in the arms of gentler memory shall hear:
"All I'm asking is give peace a chance."
Maybe one someone will.

the Geoffrey conflict and the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

What follows is an interview I conducted with Dr. Chomsky in early October, in which the primary focus guiding print media coverage are debated.

Q: Using the invasion of Afghanistan as evidence of increased Soviet aggressiveness, a wide spectrum of military experts find the U.S. in need of greater defense preparedness. But they are running up against opposition in many Americans who, after the Vietnam War, became wary of the military's requests for increased defense spending, a skepticism which has been termed the "Vietnam Syndrome." How would you regard the press in handling this issue?

A: Well, if you go back to 1968, the overwhelming mass of the American population accepted, without question, the standard propaganda line, just as today the overwhelming mass of the Soviet population accepts the comparable propaganda line. They are in Afghanistan to protect the people from terrorists, etc. As far as we can see, most people believed this war was reasonable for being in Vietnam. But as the war went on, popular opposition developed opposing the war, and liberal commentary began to accept the content of the political leadership and of the indoctrination system. They began to pick up a different picture of the war.

And that is what led to the so-called Vietnam syndrome, that is, a very substantial part of the American population gradually came around to the opinion that American involvement in Vietnam had nothing to do with defending the people from aggression or anything of the sort, but was simply an intolerable form of military intervention. That was the main task of the American propaganda system in the 1970's, to try to overcome that.

It was mid-1968 when the business community, the really powerful people in the U.S., just decided that it was not worth it, it was costing us too much, it was eroding the balance of payments, it was affecting our economic structure — we should simply liquidate it. And about the same time, the Times started going with that decision, too, which of course is what you would expect. I mean, the Times keeps very close to the opinions of people who really have power in our society.

Q: Why?

A: Well, for one thing, the owner media are major corporations. Therefore, they automatically reflect the interests of the major corporations. I mean, you don't ask, Why does General Motors try to maximize profit in it's sales? They wouldn't be in business for very long. And if an individual corporation didn't more or less keep to the primary interests of those who had true power — those who were the owners — they wouldn't be in business very long, either.

In fact, there have been times when even the Times has been threatened, on the stock market, because of a very slight deviation from the mainstream, things the mild tax reforms, even, trivial matters like that have led to noticeable changes in the stock market, and elicited explicit warnings in business journals like Business Week and the Wall Street Journal that they had better shape up.

Those threats are latent and almost never have to be executed.

The people who have power in the press are representatives of the liberal, corporate, state capital system. Therefore, it would rarely occur to them to deviate from its primary objectives and commitments, nor would it even occur to them to understand and face them.

Q: How does the basic commitment translate itself into what a reporter does?

A: Well, in very complex and subtle ways, but sometimes effective ways. For example, if some journalist happened not to accept the framework and to be thinking in different terms, and wanting to different issues, he wouldn't remain very long at his newspaper. His copy would be rejected by the higher editors as improper. If

"From the beginnings of our childhood, it's drilled into us to have a sense of identification with something that is called "ours." Well, that has some value to it — solidarity, being helpful to others, or something — but it's distorted into blind subservience to institutions and authority which then shows itself in the arena of social life as complete acceptance of authoritarian systems and the indoctrination they impose."
— Noam Chomsky

Q: What is the print media's interest in taking on that task, one which you might contend contributed to an atmosphere that inspired Iranian hostage to say that the only thing we did wrong in Vietnam was lose?

A: That was essentially the New York Times' position. For example, for as long as it looked as though the U.S. was going to win, they were very pro-war. They turned against the war at about the same time the business community did.

schools, or not dropping out, or something like that. Or he would be told to look at different topics. If he kept it up, worked on issues he wouldn't be working for the newspaper. So, in fact, there is a selection process.

Also a section of professionalism has developed which, if you really look at it carefully, turns out to be highly ideological in character, and which is enforced — not by any plot — but automatically by filter out people who might not conform to the ideological structure.

Q: For a propaganda system to work, it is necessary to have some cooperation at the receiving end. Why is it that the American people seem so willing to follow uncritically what is presented to them in the media?

A: First of all, this is not something which is restricted to the United States. In fact, it's a characteristic that exists in very different kinds of systems.

For example, the Soviet system is just about as radical a system of propaganda you can imagine, in the way it represses and the techniques it employs in every respect. If you look at the invasion of Czechoslovakia or the invasion of Afghanistan, as far as we can tell, the Soviet population was overwhelmingly in favor of it and accepted it passionately, because the easiest thing to do is believe what you are told. That's the easiest thing, involves the least effort, the least risk and dangers.

Also, it's like crossing the four-lane road. I mean, you're with everyone else, and so it's good and pleasant.

Q: Isn't that just simple deference to authority?

A: It's partly that. Take the case of clothing. Why does anyone dress for their own clothing? I mean, if you stop to think about it, it's the most absurd activity possible. What do you care if you dress wise or someone else wise? In fact, why is it good sense? I mean, if you're on a U.S., but if you're not . . .

From the beginnings of our childhood, it's drilled into us to have a sense of identification with something that is called "ours." Well, that has some value to it — solidarity, being helpful to others, or something — but it's distorted into blind subservience to institutions and authority which then shows itself in the arena of social life as complete acceptance of authoritarian systems and the indoctrination they impose.

Q: Is this a habit of subordination or just a following of the path of least resistance?

A: It's a habit that is very easy to fall into, because it's the easiest one to adopt. You really have to fight to not be entertained by this.

For example, suppose you're skeptical of what appears in the press. In order to reinforce your skepticism, you're going to have to do an awful lot of work.

Q: But in working to reinforce your skepticism about the meanings expressed in the media, are you not in effect just finding, by analogy, another truth?

A: I don't think you have to find another truth, because that's just as bad. What you try to do is find the truth. It means really working. It means, first of all, a lot of effort in asking a lot of hard questions. You should not just believe what you are told.

And it involves being in a strange position, between power and authority, which may have a cost — in severe cost. In fact, all along there are opportunities denied you, opportunities for privilege and power are denied you, and privileges and so on.

If a person has those two choices facing him — to question or obey — he'll pick the easy way out. And the easy way out is just to obey.

Never mind that they've broken up, the book would have you believe Morrison's in artistic exile, just waiting for a comeback. Do you seriously think any individual could get away with such a shoddy act of self-glorification, even if it were true?

Jimi Hendrix and Janis Joplin have certainly been raked over the proverbial coals in attempts to romanticize their existence to a generation who've felt neglected because they weren't old enough to be at Woodstock.

You needn't even be deceased to be victimized or have the privacy of your life and the lives of those close to you invaded. Just ask Keith Richards. His "biography" (novel?) Up and Down with the Rolling Stones, by former drug go-for Tony Sanchez, have you believe the Stones' lead guitarist is getting blood transfusions every week. Never mind that the book was twisted out of proportion by those who never read it, and that Richards, in fact, oly did it once to get by customs officals for a U.S. concert tour which would have been cancelled if proof of his long-known-about heroin habit was documented.

Then there's the bunch that will use a rock star's death for their own pre-conceived social delusions; the people who never liked rock who will say, "See what happens to those rock stars!," or, as in Mr. Lennon's case, the pseudo-liberals who will claim his murder as one more reason why we need gun control.

But the worst is certainly yet to come. There's no denying Lennon was a giant in the industry, and as with other giants (most notably Elvis Presley) his death will bring an avalanche of products to prey on the grief and pocketbooks of a gullible public. T-Shirts, buttons, "I Knew John Best" serializations in rags, and the various Beatles-Lennon record collections will surface as posthumous poison in a short time to come.

The whole process is too predictable and too disrespectful of the artist. If musicians wanted their "exclusive, previously unreleased records" put on the market, they would have done so long before their death. The probably reason it isn't done is because the artist felt the out-takes from live and studio sessions didn't mesh well with the albums' concept, or were just downright embarassing or not-up-to-par. So it's more than a little degrading to take advantage of the artist's career when the person isn't around to defend her/himself.

But the worst is certainly yet to come. There's no denying Lennon was a giant in the industry, and as with other giants (most noteworthy Elvis Presley) his death will bring an avalanche of products to prey on the grief and pocketbooks of a gullible public.

Twelve Year Water Shortage

Crisis Dries Up But the Problems Don't

By James F. Mahoney

Editor's note: This is the second and final analyzing the water shortage which crippled the town of Amherst and forced the evacuation of the University of Massachusetts campus in September.

The town of Amherst has faced serious water shortage problems for the past twelve years, yet little has been done about it until the crisis this fall.

September's water shortage was not a surprising event. Town officials have said they knew a potentially serious water problem existed during the summer. But, despite almost desperate warnings from them, water usage remained high.

Amherst residents, aware of past shortages, ignored the call for voluntary conservation. When the University of Massachusetts opened its doors on Labor Day weekend, the already overtaxed supply was critically low.

The sudden drain on the water supply could not be countered by the town's pumping stations, and storage tanks dried up.

The ensuing turmoil forced UMass to evacuate and placed the town under stringent water conservation measures. The campus became a ghost town under a facsimile of martial law. State police stepped up patrols and Civil Defense personnel came in as 11,000 students were forced to go home.

The town then started remedying the water situation.

Water Trouble in Past

The town has had a history of water supply problems dating back to the post World War II expansion of UMass and Amherst College.

When it became evident UMass was growing in exponential leaps, the town started to look at other resources.

Until the 1950's, Amherst depended on the Pelham reservoirs for the bulk of its supply. The town then added the Atkins Reservoir in Shutesbury and dug two wells in South Amherst to supplement the Pelham reservoirs, according to Water Supply Sources; a report by Tighe and Bond of Easthampton.

The action proved insufficient with the explosion of construction at UMass in the next decade, so the town sought to add more facilities to its systems.

The Brown well and the Brickyard well, in Amherst, were dug in the late 1960's. Both of these wells rely on rain and surface water to keep them operational.

First Severe Water Shortage

Yet in 1968, Amherst faced its first severe water shortage when a particularly dry summer left the town with very low water resources despite the new wells.

Residents voted to investigate the possibility of digging a series of wells in South Amherst at the Lawrence Swamp.

Town meeting members considered financing the Lawrence Swamp project but instead funded an environmental and engineering study.

The decision to start the Lawrence Swamp digging was delayed for other reasons, Town Manager A. Louis Hayward said. When he took office in 1974 townspeople were still considering two other options — a permanent hook-up with Hadley and a tie in with the Quabbin Reservoir.

Hayward said it was early 1976 before both options were rejected by voters and another three years before the Lawrence Swamp was given the okay to proceed.

In 1978, Amherst was again faced with a similar water shortage. The Lawrence Swamp site had yet to be developed.

"It was March, 1979, and the Town Meeting still did not support the Lawrence Swamp Project, but two nights later we got a reversal of the vote and went ahead with the project," Hayward said.

Democracy in Amherst

"Decisions are solid in Amherst, because a lot of people get involved. They are concerned about the town and before they spend millions of dollars they want to be sure that it will be a sound commitment for the community," Hayward said.

When the town was struck with a water shortage this year, the Lawrence Swamp site was partially developed. It is now complete and functioning.

The dry summer and knowledge that the reservoirs were beginning to evaporate led Town officials to ask the community to voluntarily conserve water.

Warnings Snubbed

"Nobody took our warnings seriously," Hayward said. "The situation might have been easier if we had gotten even 10 or 15 percent conservation."

Hayward said he delivered the voluntary conservation statement to the public through local papers and radio stations and started to make preparations for a shortage in early August.

UMass Chancellor Henry Koffler said he received a memorandum in early August asking the University to conserve water. But Koffler said the memo failed to stess the potentially serious conditions and circumstances.

UMass Conserved When Possible

Ted DeLesdernier, UMass chief utility engineer said there was little the school could do during the summer months to conserve. The air conditioning units had to stay on because of the conference activities and laboratories, he said.

During the crisis, the air conditioners wich use the most water were shut off in all buildings except laboratories and Health Services. DeLesdernier said the air conditioning had been left on during the summer months

WILL HOCKEY RETURN

Bob Mitchell

We walk in his Bowker office and are filled with prospects, partners and projects. He and former head basketball coach Jack Leaman share the small cubicle during business hours. His duties now include bowling leagues, jogging, bowling and hockey - his first love - in the physical education department. He is a jovial guy, but behind his happiness there is some bitterness between himself and the UMass Athletic Department.

He is Jack Cantell, former head coach of the UMass hockey team. Cantell, who led here the Minutemen ascended for 11 seasons and last reached UMass to the Division II national championship in 1973, stood and watch as the Athletic Department eliminated the hockey team from the arena for what is limited to worst words over 11:30:11. The program was officially shut down on May 4, 1979.

"I'm sure what we can do with hockey at UMass," Cantell said in a Collegian column published shortly after the sport was phased out. "I really hate to see it go, all we needed was the back to really win."

But unfortunately for Cantell and his skaters, the "ands" just weren't available. The Athletic Department cited the lack of funds as well as the inability of the University to have a competitive hockey the UMass it used as reasons for the elimination of hockey.

Obviously we support the major sports - football, basketball, baseball and hockey - with the proper funding they deserve before we distribute funds to minor sports such as tennis, golf, crew, track and the like. If we start eliminating our major sports programs on the basis of game performance, one would have to wonder just how much longer the basketball team can stay afloat.

It seems to me that when a department takes away the scholarship program of any sport (like that sport will attract only players of lesser talent who do not get scholarship offers from other schools. It is extremely difficult for any school to build up a outstanding team in any league without a scholarship recruiting program to attract the athletic talents.

I believe that the Athletic Department planned a phasing out of the hockey program back in 1979, when it decided not the ten hockey scholarships and eliminated the junior varsity team. It was then too late to do anything with the hands of having to have risk they played their home games at Amherst College's rink. Both the gradually tightened the noose around the neck of the program.

It was doubtful that hockey would ever return to UMass back in May of 1979 and it is still doubtful today, a little over a year and a half later.

"The whole thing just wasn't handled right, the public relations department here didn't really publicize anything about hockey," a frustrated UMass defenseman Ron Tabacchi told the Collegian at the time of the elimination.

"A lot seniors at hockey really won't be considered until we get out ours are. Can still said after the song. Apparently, Tabacchi's career have remained constant. It's an unpleasant issue," he said recently. "And you can only beat an issue so much."

Will hockey ever return to UMass? I hope so, but it doesn't look good. Things like the proposed dome over Alumni Stadium which would accomodate both hockey and basketball (Lord knows it's time to get the Cage to rest), just didn't look to feasible then and they certainly don't look any better now. The dome you drive around and when like it just never got off the ground.

The person UMass personnel hockey league is composed of 16 very competitive teams. The interest in hockey is already present here at UMass and with a scholarship program it would skyrocket. Of course, it will be no easy task to reinstate the hockey program and get it back on its feet, but it is a task that is certainly worthy of the effort.

WEEKEND DIRECTORY

The men's basketball team will compete in the Massachusetts Hanover Classic at Iona on Friday and Saturday. Other teams in the tourney will be Dartmouth and St. Francis.

The women's basketball team is hoping to bounce back from Wednesday's loss to Boston's University of Quebec when they travel to Syracuse Saturday to face the Canadiens at 5:30 p.m.

The men's gymnastics team is at home tomorrow at 1 p.m. in Boyden Auditorium's gym. Army-Syracuse University. The last time the two have faced Syracuse won a 182 while they won by a whopping 16 points. The women's squad is at the downtown tomorrow.

There will be a women's softball meeting Monday, Oct. 21 at 7 p.m. in 160FE Use. All interested should attend or contact Diane Bernstein at 545-1656 before 5 and 5-0000.

The men's swim team is at Springfield today and the women travel to Clark University in Worcester tomorrow at 11 a.m.

The UMass wrestling team is at Rutgers this weekend for a four team meet with Lehigh and Princeton in addition to Rutgers.

Hoopmen at Iona For Hanover Classic

By Jonathan Hamilton

Fresh off a much-needed, morale boosting victory over Bryant College on Tuesday, the University of Massachusetts basketball team heads south to participate in the third annual Hanoverpower's Hanover Classic this at Iona College in New Rochelle, N.Y., tonight and tomorrow night. UMass' tonight and tomorrow night. UMass' win Tuesday snapped a three-game losing streak this season.

WMUA's (91.1 FM) Howie Schaiter and Jim Mullins will broadcast UMass basketball this weekend starting at 6 p.m. tonight.

Senator UMass and Iona, St. Francis College of Loretto, PA and UMass' first round opponent Dartmouth College meet one the tournaments. Tip-off time set to 6 p.m. for the first game and 8 p.m. for the night cap. Consolation and championship games will be played on Saturday at the same times as Friday night.

The Minutemen take on the Big Green for the first time since 1974 when they recently beat them 74-68. Dartmouth is just back from their annual pastoral. Ended the season they represented the Ivy League by defeating Colgate University 74-68 and the University of New Hampshire 66-61. The Big Green, like UMass returns from a lot of height. They are led by 6'8" senior forward Gary Lawrence and 6'5" freshman Paul Anderson. Second shot height Dartmouth starts two guards, Joe Edwards and senior Calvin Johnson who are 5'9" and 6'0" respectively.

If the Minutemen get by Dartmouth they will likely face Iona, the strongest team in the tourney. Iona is laden with height as Gary Ogrize (6'7") Tom Kiser (6'8") and Mike Orr (6'10") combine a powerful frontcourt. Iona (2-2) has played the strongest schedule thus far losing to Vanderbilt 82-59 and Fordham 69-57 while defeating South Carolina 70-68 and Long Island University 108-96.

St. Francis (2-2) will house in the University of Pittsburgh 90-70 the Eastern Eight foe of UMass and the University of Pennsylvania 75-58 rounds out the teams for the tourney.

About 300 people from campus and surrounding towns join hands in a circle yesterday at 2 p.m. in a silent vigil to John Lennon. (Staff photo by Scott Burke)

UMass joins in worldwide Lennon tribute

By MAUREEN SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

In the hush of a late afternoon snowfall, about 300 people held hands in silence for 10 minutes by the campus pond at the University of Massachusetts in tribute to John Lennon yesterday.

As part of a worldwide memorial requested by Yoko Ono, Lennon's widow, the group gathered at the campus pond at 2:00 yesterday to pay final homage to the ex-Beatle slain Monday night in New York City.

At first, there were few people by the pond, but as the designated hour approached, more and more people gathered there in front of the Old Chapel. When the bells rang two, Linda Geary, speaker of the undergraduate student senate, requested that the group form a ring and hold hands.

Except for a few dogs nearby that was the last sound until the ceremony ended.

The ring grew as more students walked forward to join in the vigil, oblivious to the cold and snow.

Many bowed their heads; some looked at the sky which began to clear. One wore an armband, while a family of three held a poster saying: "John Lennon, 1940-1980; Imagine all the people/living life in peace/You may say I'm a dreamer/But I'm not the only one/I hope some day you'll join us/And the world will live as one/...Rest in Peace."

There were few public announcements for the local vigil, but many found about it from a poster hung in Southwest.

"I was in Southwest last night when I saw it (the poster)," said Geary. "It said something about the Lennon vigil at the pond. I called WMUA this morning to tell them what I found out."

"I heard about the vigil on the radio," said Jean Elsktian of the UMass political science department, "and my family (her husband Errol and son Eric) decided to come down to pay respects to John Lennon.

"He (Lennon) changed my life," she said. "He helped me see things in a new way. He gave a song to the peace movement which I was a part of. In my generation, Lennon was one of the great heroes."

"The ceremony was pretty spontaneous," said Nancy Seisel of the Coolidge Tower dormitory after the vigil, "I felt really good that people would come together; I think it was John's wish that people respect him this way. I was shocked when I heard about his death; it wasn't a death, it was an assassination."

Judges decide elections invalid

By ED LEVINE
Collegian Staff

A three judge panel of the student judiciary last night issued a temporary injunction against commuters elected to new terms in last October's Undergraduate Student Senate elections, forbidding them from voting in the senate and ordering former members to assume those seats.

The tribunal's decision stemmed from a case against the senate, its Coordinating Committee and its Governmental Affairs Committee pertaining to October's elections. The plaintiff in the case, Robert Zimmerman, a senator from McNamara Dormitory, had charged that irregularities existed in the commuter election which warranted it being thrown out and a new election held.

The tribunal did not decide on the merits of the case, only issued the injunction, last night, due the timing involved. James Lang, presiding justice in the case, said the semester is almost over and it would would be difficult to hear the case over intersession. In addition, Gary Minsky, another judge in the case, is graduating, and a new tribunal would have to be convened to hear the case.

In their decision, the judges ruled that the Coordinating Committee would be allowed to function as it now stands until the beginning of next semester when any members who were elected last October would have to resign and new members appointed.

Senate speaker Linda Geary last night said only one member of the committee may be affected by the ruling.

The decision came after nearly six hours of debate yesterday and another four last Thursday night. At the first hearing session, Jon Hensleigh, the advocate for the senate and Governmental Affairs Chair Diane Mueller, stormed out after his six pre-trial motions were denied.

Among Hensleigh's pre-trial motions was one calling for dismissal of the case on the grounds that the prosecution did not submit a complaint signed by 25 students as required by the Student Government Association constitution.

Prosecuting advocate Craig Sherwood argued that the provisions in the constitution providing for the signatures was a by-law and was superceded by general provisions of the constitution.

Hensleigh also argued that Clerk of Courts Michael Cohen has worked closely with the judges on the case and may have biased them. Cohen himself was involved in the initial complaints against the election heard by the senate in October, Hensleigh said.

Hensleigh pointed to a ten minute recess Thursday night during which Cohen entered the judge's chambers for several minutes. When the judges came out, they announced their decisions on the six motions.

Cohen denied the charge, saying he was adivisng the judges on matters of legal procedure and not the specifics of the case.

At yesterday's hearing, defense advocate Joel Weissman, who replaced Hensleigh after he left the courtroom Thursday, also left the hearing after his request for a change of venue, or court, was denied by the panel. Weissman charged that the judges were biased by Cohen and Sherwood.

"We do not believe for one second that we are receiving a fair trial here," Weissman said before he left the courtroom. "I no longer want to carry on with this without a change of venue."

Following Weissman's exit, no members of the defense were present as Sherwood presented three witnesses before the final decision was made.

Geary said last night she would appeal the decision to a new court next semester.

Faculty to protest negotiation failure

By STEPHEN MORAN
Collegian Staff

As the faculty makes ready to hold a teach-in inside the Whitmore Administration Building today at noon, the administration has asked the faculty union to accept the services of a mediator.

The purpose of the teach-in, called for by the rank and file of the Massachusetts Society of Professors, is to demonstrate faculty support for its contract negotiating team, and show the administration there will be no "business as usual" if a contract is not signed by next semester, said MSP President Peter D'Errico.

At last Thursday's emergency general membership meeting, MSP members said they planned to walk into the offices of the principle administrative officers, sit down, and refuse to vacate the premises until they began discussing outstanding contract issues. The MSP is currently negotiating its second, three year contract. Its members have worked without a contract since July 1.

The call for mediation came in the form of a letter form University chief negotiator Susan Lenox to MSP chief negotiator Jack Pollidari delivered at last Friday's negotiating session.

"The university proposes that the parties jointly engage the services of a mediator, at shared expenses, to assist us toward speedy contract closure," it read.

Lenox indicated the Board of Regents had concluded an early settlement would be necessary "to assure that monies will be available for the full and adequate funding of new agreements."

Union sources said the MSP, after consultation with its Joint Campus Committee, will welcome such an arrangement.

The MSP rank and file has also called for a faculty/student teach-in Tuesday, February 2. The faculty will use this forum, on next semester's first day of classes, to discuss outstanding contract issues and their affects on the student body.

Student Government co-President Richard Moran said the faculty contract will determine the quality and quantity of faculty, and thus will have a great impact on the quality of education.

"Like both administration and union, I am in favor of a speedy settlement. But I am more concerned with content than speed, and the student's interests should not be sacrificed to get a speedy settlement," he said.

"The maintenance of a large merit pool will insure that faculty members remain on campus, and can be recruited from the national market," Moran said. The merit pool is a sum of money distributed to outstanding faculty members, and is part of the overall salary agreement.

Moran also said he would like to see layoff language that prohibited the administration from unitlaterally discontinuing a university college or program, but would also allow for the dismissal of incompetant professors.

In a related incident, union officials have confirmed the January 5 departure date of MSP chief negotiator Jack Pollidari, who has asked for a leave of absence. A search for his replacement is underway and an acting chief negotiator will be appointed and serve until Pollidari's replacement is found, said union officials.

Irish riot for hunger-strikers

BELFAST, Northern Ireland (AP) — Cattle hurling Irishmen and stones rampaged through Londonderry early yesterday as the cremation of one of seven jailed Northern Ireland hunger strikers was reported sharply exacerbated. Authorities braced for more violence and canceled all police leaves.

Sean McKenna, sentenced to 25 years for attempted murder and other offenses, was reported the weakest of the seven having Roman Catholics who yesterday went their fifth day with only water and salt in the strike demanding political prisoner status for jailed guerrillas.

"Without treatment his condition is likely to worsen in the very near hours and may become irreversible," a Northern Ireland office spokesman said.

Prep girls expelled for prank

SPRINGFIELD (AP) — Three students at the Miss Public School for Girls have been expelled from the exclusive prep school after admitting they spiked the punch at a dormitory Christmas party and then undercut, according to school officials.

Nine of the 10 girls who drank the punch and one adult were taken to area hospitals Wednesday night, some precautions, according to Headmaster William Lawlor.

Two students were kept overnight at Western Memorial Hospital. The others were treated for the stress and released pastor and released, officials said.

A sample of the drink was sent to the University of Massachusetts at Amherst for analysis, but Springfield police detectives said apparently four Valium tablets were dropped into the punch bowl as a prank.

Pubs ignore TV soaps suit

HANOVER, IAP — Despite a $6 million ABC-TV suit against a Sperry distributor for showing video-taped segments of "General Hospital" allegedly without the network permission, at least two Massachusetts pubs plan to keep showing the soap opera to attract Sunday drinkers.

"I don't owe ABC anything," said James Hahan, owner of the Fox Penny Pub at the Hanover Mall. "They owe me something for showing the commercials. ABC is doing is helping them."

Hahan said he plans not only to continue showing the American Broadcasting Company soap opera every Sunday, but to add showings of "Dallas," the Columbia Broadcasting System saga, J.R. and all, to pay up even higher at the pub.

Another tavern, Shenanigans, in Canton, plans to continue showing "General Hospital" on Sundays, according to manager Richard Barrett.

He said the screen ball not heard from ABC-TV about showing tapes recorded off local television transmissions.

OPEC tries to 'restore unity'

BALI, Indonesia (AP) — OPEC oil ministers gathered here yesterday amid heavy security that turned part of this holiday island into an armed camp and brought to a close talks that war between two of its members — Iran and Iraq — which dominate its future decisions.

A security officer at the 13- member Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries meeting the added if he expected oil flowing from stalemated wars the middle east Persian Gulf soon.

"The answer will be no war here on Bali," he replied with a belief smile.

Conference sources say most of the morning will be devoted to administrative matters that have accumulated since the last major OPEC conference in Geneva in September and an attempt to "restore unity."

Polish farmers threaten to strike in first labor unrest since buildup

By ROLAND FRINZ
Associated Press

WARSAW, Poland (AP) — Delegates claiming to represent 600,000 private Polish farmers yesterday threatened a nationwide farm strike if a court fails to register their independent union on Dec. 30.

The warning — the first public statement of such a possibility — was the first new threat of labor unrest since the independent union Solidarity appealed for calm after severe Soviet and Polish army criticism that it was spreading chaos and anarchy.

The boisterous farmers' meeting came amid church and union appeals for national unity as Poland began a week of unprecedented commemorations for victims of army and police suppression of 1970 food price riots in Gdansk.

Roman Catholic Rev. Josef Glemkowski said he was complying with Solidarity's request that he open a breakfast Mass with an appeal for harmony.

It gathered brief mention in the broadcast and from pulpits scattered of the "Soviet dangers" facing Poland which "must not risk losing her security and sovereignty through irresponsible action."

Last week, the Union States revealed that the Soviets had completed a troop buildup along Poland's borders and could intervene at any time. The purported threat prompted the NATO allies and other nations to warn the Soviet that all face consequences if it intervened.

The independent farm delegates attended a Mass in Warsaw's Holy Cross Cathedral and then met with Andrzej Gwiazda, a Solidarity leader who promised them the national organization's blessings. Gwiazda's statement was the first public promise of support from the national group, formed after the summer's wave of nationwide strikes.

One demand of the farm group, whose members are among the nation's 3 million private farmers, is that their independent union be open to the 1.1 million workers of state and collective farms.

They also unanimously adopted a resolution calling for guarantees of farmers' rights to own property and for equal government support of private and state farms.

Millions pay final tribute

By MIKE SILVERMAN
Associated Press

In whole and in one, Boston has ceased the world post final tribute to John Lennon yesterday as parks, plazas and even parking lots. Up to 100,000 gathered in New York's Central Park, while in Liverpool, England, where the group got its start, 500 were stayed when fans stormed an outdoor stage during a concert.

Hundreds of silent vigils were organized after John Glen, widow of the 40-year-old musician, asked people to "pray for John's soul" by observing 10 minutes of silence "wherever you are" at 2 p.m. EST.

She asked for individual mourning, but many felt the need to congregate in shared homage to the man and the disbanded group whose innovative music and non-conformist style seemed to symbolize the passion and the protest of the 1960s.

"People just need a focal point for their sense of loss," said Bob Linden, broadcast director of Omaha, Neb.'s KEZO-FM, which sponsored a memorial that drew 2,000 to Omaha's Aksarben Stadium.

Radio stations in many countries observed 10 minutes of silence, while others played special programs of Beatles music.

"I think it's great that all over the world, in unison, there was silence," said Paul Gary, one of 500 people who attended a vigil in Los Angeles' Griffith Park.

"It was kind of eerie," said Bill Fiore, one of 1,000 who gathered in memorial at Boston's Copley Square. "At 2 o'clock was the first chopper — it was kind of sad."

In Melbourne, Australia, several thousand people gathered near the city square at 9 a.m. Monday local time — midnight EST — to watch a group of musicians perform a Beatles concert.

The largest gatherings were in New York and in Liverpool, but in dozens of U.S. cities, Beatles records turned up in record — in many cases, the Beatles' music was the only music heard in the city. In Tokyo, fans were asked to sit, literally, in their seats with their children on their laps.

More than 1,000 people took part at the Statehouse in Columbus, S.C.; 1,000 at the Statehouse in Salem, Mass.; 2,000 at the site of the 1982 World's Fair in Seattle; 1,000 in Center Hill along Chopin's gardens; 400 at Lamoure State University in Baton Rouge; 600 at Miami's Bicentennial Park; 400 at the Salt Lake City Memorial Grove Park.

In Toledo, Ohio, about 1,000 people crowded into the small parking lot behind Dominic's, a southside restaurant where owner Greg Dubbin, said: "I loved the man and wanted to show my sorrow with people who felt the same way."

About 4,500 people screamed a vigil in Red Rocks, a natural red sandstone amphitheater in the Rocky Mountain foothills west of Denver. The theater had played a concert there in 1981.

In Kenosha, Wis., 150 people gathered in 20-degree weather on a hill and stood silently in the form of a peace symbol.

In Newport, Ore., 30-year old Deborah Nichols organized a vigil at an old lighthouse facing the Pacific Ocean.

UMass workers settle on tenative 3 year contract

By RICHARD VASILE
Collegian Staff

Negotiators for the University administration and the union representing 1,200 campus maintenance, grounds, custodial, security, and food service workers reached a tentative agreement Thursday night on a new three year contract, ending seven months of negotiations.

Jonathan G. Tirole, president of Local 1776 of the American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees, said the agreement will be submitted to union members sometime this week for ratification.

Under the agreement, union members will receive a grade and step increase retroactive to July 1, a five percent pay increase retroactive to Dec. 7, a wage reopener clause effective Aug. 30, 1981, and a 9% across-the-board increase on June 27, 1982.

Although the previous contract officially expired June 1, some members worked under a provision which extended the terms of the contract, until another agreement or an impasse in negotiations was reached.

Bob Tirole and chief University negotiator John Dwyer said they were pleased with the agreement. Tirole said the union received less than it had hoped for because of the passing of proposition "two and a half" in November and Governor Edward J. King's subsequent economic policies.

Semester review — Water, labor, elections

It might not have been the best of times, but it surely wasn't the worst of times.

The semester had barely begun when newly arrived students were sent home because of a severe water shortage. Out, hell, even Chancellor Henry Koffler's house dry. Students evacuated quickly and relatively calmly, passing an unplanned test of emergency procedures.

The summer previous had been a dry one, and the water supply was low. Then, in September, the rains came, and came, and came. Rivers overflowed their banks, and the water supply was contaminated with sediment. Koffler declared a state of emergency, and the University was closed for a week.

The water crisis was over, but the effects lingered. Students were asked to conserve water, and many did. Water pressure was low, and showers were cold. Laundry facilities were overcrowded, and many students had to wash their clothes in the sink.

Labor unrest in the University ran in the area also characterized the semester. For seven days the 700 non-professional employees of the Graduate Nursing Home went on strike, picketing the home. Several confrontations with the police led to 19 persons arrested by the end of the strike, including several UMass students. Their cases will be heard in February.

At the same time, the Undergraduate Student Senate attempted to hold their annual election. Two defendants were charged from the election, the Progressive Student Alliance, one organized coalition, and the write-in candidates. Three names were scrapped on a ballot error, later deemed illegal. The election was marked by confusion over the matters, the impartiality of election officials, and the use of PSA-designated text in candidate's names.

What followed was a volley of power and blame, as the senate's Fundraising Committee declared the election invalid and the senate convened by senate turning the Contracting Committee decision. The senate are now before student tribunals. (See related story page 5).

Throughout the semester students joined senate, usually for a student representative on the board of trustees, the newly formed organization Students Against Apartheid in South Africa.

A rocker's first communion

The Jim Carroll Band
Stage West, Hartford
December 13

By JIM MORAN
Collegian Staff

"The superstar of rock in 1981 — Jim Carroll." That's how he was introduced, and that pretty much set the tone for the remarkable display of the essence of rock observed here Saturday night.

He has everything — the decadent perspective, the searching-soul look, the ability to capture our attention with his lyrical expression of life, all drawn from a past filled with fallen friends and heroes, drugs, sex and you know how it goes.

Carroll opened this unfortunately short, 10-song set with the drop of the (stereo) needle as he rendered a powerful true-to-the-record version of "Wicked Gravity," the first cut on his first LP, Catholic Boy. The energy level never dissipated once, as this red-haired, Irish Catholic kid from New York spilled his guts before our ears in melodic confession.

He showed his respect for women, envisioning the "true girlfriend" who would be like his sister, in the fast, choppy style he utilizes in "Three Sisters."

Then came the title cut from his album, an ode to the heritage which has shaped the vision of this talented artist; the dead-hollow backbeat of drummer Wayne Woods meshes effectively as the singer went through his litany of the seven sacraments of the Roman Catholic church, which has influenced him, as he translated into song what he has learned on the street versus what he was told in parochial school. "I got CON-FIR-MA-SHUN," he sneers; and you knew he knew where he was coming from.

The crowd was in audible ecstasy as Carroll paid homage to another poet-rocker, Lou Reed, in a brought-back-to-life cover of "Sweet Jane." The cheering was reciprocated when Carroll gave his all in a ballad for his friends from the 60's, now a certified radio hit, "People Who Died."

Though Carroll is clearly the ring leader of the outfit, that status does not negate the high level of competency contributed by his fellow band members. Brothers Brian (guitar) and Steve (bass) Lindsley were a two-man battalion of chords to the singer's right. Lead guitarist Terrell Winn had total control of his strings, and worked over some nice guitar instrumentals in the encore "It's Too Late." Brian Lindsley and Winn loked the part of Twyla Tharp rejects in their leg-warmers, adding a pauper effect to boot.

After the show, Carroll talked about his impetus for going beyond poetry into rock and roll. Said Carroll, "The visionary and other aspects are the same. Poets write for other poets. Rock stars write for other rock stars. I'll always write poetry, but with intellect and heart, which you can expand upon in rock. "Carroll said the references to the "cashier in a bookstore" and "fall from the stage" in his song "Crow" are indeed abut his former girlfriend, Patti Smith, whom he said he "doesn't see too much anymore."

Carroll also spoke about a comment he made in a recent interview with Tom Snyder on NBC's "Tomorrow" program, where he said that "born-again Christianity is like a methodone maintenance program" in which its practitioners are "into religion for what they can get out of it."

Dream of financial aid in the future nightmare for low income students

To the Editor:

UMass students have begun to organize to fight the tuition increases and financial aid cutbacks that are in process. Particular attention must be paid to the fact that it will be increasingly difficult, if not impossible, for students from low-income families to get an education. Ed Apodaca, UMass director of financial aid, is quoted in a recent New York Times article as saying, "The 1980's will mark the end of the dream of access, choice, and retention for low-income and minority students."

It is, of course, problematic whether the Reagan administration will appropriate the necessary money to implement the Educational Amendments Act of 1980 which Carter signed into law last month. It is not problematic that if money is appropriated most of the benefits of the new act will accrue to middle-income families. These families have been able to assume for several decades that a post-secondary education was available to any of their children who wanted one. But inflation has hit hard at this assumption. Wanting to maintain the edge that the middle class has always had in relation to those less well off, the legislators made some changes via the 1980 act that are going to effectively squeeze out the low-income student.

They eliminated from the financial aid formula the requirement that a family include its equity in a home, reduced from $25,000 to $10,000 the total amount of savings or other assets that have to be included in the formula, and instituted a Parent Loan Program to assist middle-income parents with their cash flow problems. The resulting competition for the federal BEOGs and money for loans as well as the cutbacks in work/study and increasing costs are going to make it very difficult for students whose families have no financial resources.

Two things must be kept in mind when organizing around these issues.

1. What policy is the University going to adopt in the face of these changes? Will it move to assure the low-income student that s/he, once admitted, has just as good a chance of getting a degree as the middle-income student? Or will the present policy continue whereby the percentage of low-income students remains the same but the faces are always changing?

2. Not all the students at UMass are eighteen to twenty-two year olds. This university seems to have a particular resistance to recognizing that older non-traditional students have some needs that are just as legitimate as the nineteen year olds'. For instance, thousands and thousands of dollars will be spent on a spring concert with not a second thought, but students who are parents could turn blue before that amount of money would be allotted for much needed childcare programs. Why is family housing at UMass run like a private enterprise when clearly it is not?

Special care needs to be taken by those who are organizing for positive changes that these older students' opportunities for education are not ignored only to discover later that they were inadvertently shafted down the drain.

Collegian butcherings inexcusable errors

To the Editor:

Until a few American and "Americanized" bands like The B52s and The Clash popularized the new sounds of the late 1970s, it was a rare event to see an album by a "new wave" band reviewed in a daily newspaper. I have read many Collegian butcherings, and most are stamped with one similarity, inexcusable errors.

Misinformation not only breeds an uninformed review, but because the Collegian influences thousands of students, many of whom have unfortunate misconceptions about the new wave of music, ignorant reviews such as Mark Wharton's (Collegian 12/9) attempt at XTC's newest album, only serve to keep students misled.

Mr. Wharton seems to harbor the delusion that for an album to be successful, it has to top the charts. That is exactly the opposite of the idea behind the new music coming out of Britain today. Just because XTC's 1979 album, Drums and Wires, went gold, doesn't mean that the band members put their considerable songwriting and instrument playing abilities to best use. Contrarily, I find the album enjoyable, but obviously shallow pop.

I don't know where Mr. Wharton got the idea that Barry Andrews, "influenced their first album to the point of almost sounding gothic." I assume he does refer to their first album, White Music, although because he thinks XTC has released only three albums to date, he could mean their second record, Go 2. White Music screams of Andy Partridge, from his ebullient vocals to his forceful guitar playing. He gives us our first taste of his expressive lyrical ability through eight of his songs.

Wharton attributes the songs he thinks are good on Black Sea to producer Steve Lillywhite. Why? Because he worked last year with the well known Peter Gabriel, not because Lillywhite has gotten his experience producing albums for artists such as The Members, or working with Brian Eno on Ultravox's 1976 album.

I fail to see the "relevance" Wharton found in the words from Drums and Wires: "When you've never met/ have difficulty. I guess that's to be expected from someone who calls the following lyrics "socially irrelevant:"

"I thought I had the whole world in my mouth
I thought I could say what I wanted to say for a second that thought became a sword in my hand
I could slay any problem that would stand in my way
I felt just like a serpentine tree bloom, a lodge had consider that nobody ever say what they really mean to say and the complexity of speech came up and we met that day and I would have made the most beautiful but the words got in the way.
I hope the words always get in the way for Andy P.
Maybe if Mr. Wharton came to give the album a second listen, he will change his views, as for me, about Black Sea.

Cascading water is a blessing

To the Editor:

I am really pleased every time I notice or learn because I know that the conversion of the Campus Center will turn into a breathtaking spectacle of cascading water.

In talking quite during the course of an otherwise drab and dry day in our four score filling up buckets.

I do not intend to be sarcastic and to prove so I will offer some constructive ideas to use the falling water to the best some practical advantages of the Campus Center and University administration.

First of all, get rid of those ugly buckets. They may be inexpensive but they are so tacky. The plastic hanging from the ceiling is somewhat effective but is so unsightly to look students and conferees.

The administration should immediately scrap any ugly plans they may have to fix the roof. Those repair plans must certainly amount to several million dollars. And even if the roof leaks then the roof would still look and act normal and have those icky plastic buckets.

What I propose may cost perhaps only a few hundred thousand dollars at most. To be specific, certain fountains should be placed under the most leaky areas, especially next to the Campus Center Information desk and the Building Operations office.

These fountains should be made of the highest quality concrete available. The design options for the fountains would include such attractions as having only the fountain or perhaps dolphins spurting water through their mouths. (The dolphins should have arched backs, also.)

The advantages of such additions are numerous. Some of these include energy savings, an aesthetic improvement of the convention, and a stylish gathering place for students.

The fountains would only require small electric pumps for most of the work would be done by gravity. We would also not have to pay physical plant workers to put up those plastic or empty full buckets.

The improvement to the concourse would be an endless source of pride for the administration. It would give that "cultural" look that our University should have. Students too would admire the fountains, gazing into them while drinking coffee or conversing with companions. The fountains would not be vandalized because of student pride.

Perhaps the best result the fountains may have would be the upgrading of the University's image. The beauty of the fountains would help to counter the image of crumbling structures at UMass (so long as we don't allow the state to build them; they would be sure to screw them up, and if that were the case, we would see the next state blue-ribbon commission concerning state and county water fountains).

Reds, Reagan, and terrorists; what would Bullfinch say?

To the Editor:

So what is the big problem over the word "Reds?" Didn't Trotsky invent that term when he invented the Red Army? Did anyone seriously think the Cincinnati Reds or some American Indians were preparing to invade Poland?

Perhaps some more energy could be spent considering the plight of the Polish people and the Polish unions instead of Collegian headlines, BSA terrorists complaints and the like.

On the whole I think there has been an improvement in news coverage by our campus paper in the last week. I was startled yesterday to see that my pastor from Scotia Lyceum had made the editorial page. But then there was that huge article on Reagan and Social Darwinism. Won't someone please take the time to write a reasonable criticism of this before it gets published and reads Bullfinch's Greek Mythology?

Polkathon raises funds for University's WMUA

By PAUL BASKEN
Collegian Staff

It was all polka music Saturday as WMUA and Disc Jockey Billy Belina broadcast the first annual Polkathon, a 12-hour fundraiser for the station.

"It came off great," said Bill Stepchew, chief engineer at WMUA. "Everyone seemed to be really enjoying it."

Belina, whose program Polka Bandstand is broadcast Wednesdays, came up with the idea of a Polkathon as a way to raise money for the station. He then contacted various DJs and bands throughout the northeast to spin records and answer phones.

Jockeys and bands enthused by the idea came from as far as New York and Rhode Island to donate their services.

Highlighting the program was Billy Czopta, a DJ from Westfield, who delighted callers with his unique music and comedy. Stepchew, said Czopta was so popular with callers he remained for a 45 minute encore.

Belina said over $1,800 was raised, but said he expects the final amount to top $2,000 with contributions from people who enjoyed the music but did not call in. Belina said he originally hoped to raise $400, a goal station members considered optimistic.

WMUA is commercial free, therefore its only source of revenue is an allocation from the Student Activities Tax Fund. The station will use the money to update and repair faulty equipment, Stepchew said. Members really appreciated Belina's efforts, he said.

Participating DJs were Belina of WMUA, Eddie Poudrier of the Heavy Chicago Polka Band in Easthampton, Joe Struzik of WNRI in Woonsocket, R.I., Roger Lichwala of the New Brass Polka Band in Indian Orchard, Chet and Marylou Dragon of WREB in Holyoke, Andy Wiernasz of WHMP in Northampton, Jack and John Libera of WQVR in Southbridge, "Big Stas" Mark Clark of WVCR in Albany, N.Y., Czopta of WLDM in Westfield, and Jimmy Sturr of the Jimmy Sturr Orchestra in Florida, N.Y.

Could you use $10,000 your Senior Year?
Consider Navy Nuclear Engineering!

Selected college students (and Masters program students) can receive over $800 per month during their senior year in college (or last 12 months of their Masters program) without altering their present curriculum.

The U.S. Navy, this nation's largest employer in the nuclear propulsion field, offers the most comprehensive applied graduate level education available in the field. This engineering school is approximately one year long, including training on an operating nuclear reactor, and was created under the auspices of the Atomic energy Commission. The Navy is presently paying graduates of this program $30,000 per year after three years on-the-job experience.

Nuclear engineering is one of the rapidly expanding fields in contemporary science; the credentials of those completing this Navy program arehighly respected throughout the industry. For more information, call (collect) or write,

Earth Foods: Vegetarian food at no profit

By JEAN SCHMIDT
Collegian Correspondent

Editor's Note: The following article is the last of a series on Recognized Student Organizations.

While the soft whine of a harmonica or the gentle strumming of a guitar brings some passersby to pause and peer inside and others seek the sanctuary of the smell of food that, distant from the doorway, most people are unnerved by the prospect of a good, cheap, vegetarian meal at the Earthfoods cooperative.

Earthfoods is a popular eating place that provides a haven for upwards of 100 customers daily, according to cooperative worker Tobey Brady. A gathering of dedicated vegetarians, the food-conscious and the just plain hungry visit the restaurant and have come to expect what Earthfoods is said to supply: "good nutrition at good prices."

The Commonwealth room, located on the first floor of the Student Union across from the Sports Center, serves as home to Earthfoods Monday through Friday, 11 a.m. through 2 p.m.

I've eaten here since I was a freshman. Dining commons cuisine just doesn't compare. The atmosphere's really nice, the people are friendly, and the service is good. And last period, Everyone is smiling" said Mark Wiering, a UMass student.

In 1972 the organization was created as an outgrowth of the neighboring People's Market Cooperative, a food co-op supplying natural and unrefined foods. Today it exists as an "anti-profit, student-run collective, said Brady.

RSO

"We're sort of fighting that whole system (profit-making). We like to save about our service, our customers, and our food," said Brady.

A specific committee plans and researches recipes—several of which are standard favorites—and its suppose daily menus worked with ingredients appointed at a member of last recipe, Brady said. A suggestion book (it is maintained for feedback from customers for the kitchen staff, she said.

There are a number of volunteers at Earthfoods who offer an hour's labor in exchange for a complete meal.

"It's really a nice place to work," said one student volunteer. "Things are relaxed in the kitchen. It's a nice job. Volunteers are given good work to work at what he or she does."

Musicians and entertainers are also volunteers. They receive space on a posted sign up sheet, said Brady.

Earthfoods is undergoing a long term evaluation process to determine whether it should expand.

But, one customer said, "I'm not just using a convenience in the main supporting would ruin the feeling it would get to be like all the other restaurants."

Another customer expressed the majority's opinion that the restaurant's small size is its "best quality." "Expansion could be impersonal overdone," he said.

Worker-customer interaction, cooperation, and feedback are important components of the Earthfoods philosophy, said Brady. Customers of varying amounts, especially volunteers, are gladly accepted and greatly appreciated, and are reflected in lower operating costs she said.

Brady said, "Customer with us. We're not here to make a buck. We're just trying to give people a good deal."

Water crisis could have been prevented

By JAMES P. MAHONEY
Collegian Staff

Editor's Note: This is part of a series on the Amherst water crisis containing official conclusions and recommendations.

September's water crisis, which sent town officials scurrying to find alternative water sources, might have been prevented if conservation measures were stringently enforced.

When the crippling water pressure drop in the town's water supply occurred September 4, the levels in the storage tanks were already 20 feet below the tank's peak point of 96 feet. Yet, public works personnel failed to react. The first action to be effected were the highest, geographical points in Amherst, predominantly the University of Massachusetts.

UMass could have shut down parts of its air conditioning systems but did not because the severity of the situation was not stressed. The air conditioning system uses the most water and a considerable amount of water could have been conserved if parts of it were shut off.

But, Ted Kellenberger, Chief Utility Engineer at UMass, said efforts to warn students about the impending shortage were casually not extensive.

"The biggest problem is that we just didn't have time to reach through the student body to get them to conserve," he said.

Town Manager A. Louis Hayward, however, said he did meet with University officials through August and kept them informed on the water levels.

He said the University still has not determined why there was such a large increase in water usage the first day of the crisis, Sept. 5. The school used 3.8 million gallons of water that day, a 40 percent increase over the day before.

The water shortage on campus was in part the responsibility of the town, which was pumping the rate of utility company, George Norton, director of the UMass physical plant, said.

A report from superintendent of Public Works, Stanley Ziomek, to Hayward, says the town failed to take action to increase the water supply by acquiring or developing additional water sources.

Although UMass official no explanations why the shortage occurred, the town and the engineering firm Tighe and Bond of Easthampton have released conclusions. Hayward and Ziomek both agree that the crisis could have been averted if certain events had taken place.

Hayward said if people in the community had conserved water more seriously the situation may not have escalated as it did.

The Tighe and Bond report, states if the fire truck hose on Belchertown Shaftar and Amherst had been made on time, it, instead of two days later, and if the Pelham pump had been put on high speed on Sept. 5, instead of the next day, the crisis may have been averted.

With the weather hot with in Hands Amherst is secure, the town stores 4.45 MGD. The peak draw during the crisis was 5.8 MGD.

"Another tank could provide 40 percent of the supply for the town. There were mistakes made on many parts. We learned this," Hayward said.

The town feels it is ready to deal with the problem if it were to happen again. Although the telemetering system, which malfunctions occasionally, will not be replaced, Ziomek said the town has a new pressure sensoring gauge, which is more accurate.

However, the malfunctioning of the equipment on the first day of the shortage led no hearing on what happened the following days, Ziomek said.

With the new pressure gauge, the need for new reservoir, that measures water levels from 4-40 feet rather than 20-60 feet will not be needed.

Hayward said, "I don't think it will happen again. The town officials and University administration are all conscious of the shortage problem. The community

Glitter and guts of show biz captured

By FRAN BASCHE
Collegian Staff

Michael Bennett's "A Chorus Line" at the Fine Arts Center yesterday captured both the glitter and guts of Broadway by taking the audience through the painfully familiar process of waiting to be accepted or rejected.

The first number, "I Hope I Get It," evokes memories of waiting to be picked for teams in elementary school as each dancer wishes out loud to be chosen for the Chorus Line. It is not long into the number that it is understood why they want to dance—the precise movements and up-beat music quickly captivate the audience.

Slowly this collection of leotards and tights takes on personalities as Zach the casting director (Tim Milbet) askes the dancers to talk about themselves.

The varying motivations behind the bright smiles emerge through the interviews. Sheila (Jan Leigh Herndon), Bebe (Kathleen Moore), and Maggie (Jane Hoffer) sing of dance as an escape from painful childhood experiences in "At The Ballet," where, unlike life, everything is beautiful and graceful.

Mike, (Gary Grant Lowenstein), describes following his sister to ballet lessons in "I Can Do That" and the taunting that comes from being a male dancer.

Diana (Alison Gertzen), whose theatrical personality won her one of the four female parts, tells Zach she failed as an actress in the New York High School for the Performing Arts in "Nothing," proving that a little chutzpah will get you further than a diploma.

In "Dance: Ten: Looks: Three" Val (Robyne Lively) describes the plastic surgery that has brought her success. "I saw what they were doing," she tells Zach, "cut and sew," and she launches into the now famous song about female physical perfection.

Kristine, the washed-up star who longs to return to the chorus line, is beautifully portrayed in "This Ballet." Even before the audience finds out about her failing career she stands apart from the others in a pained, tough manner. Her dancing in "The Music and the Mirror" is far from chorus line material.

"What I Did For Love," is the answer to anyone who have ever watched a dance performance in awe, wondering "how do they do it?" On top of the years of training, the sheer love of dance and the hunger for applause drives them to do anything for a part; to go through hours of rehearsal and agonizing auditions. Bennett's use shows us the enormous ego needed to sustain a performer through the ups and downs of show business.

While their stage personalities are secure and lofty, it becomes evident once they begin their interviews that being themselves is difficult. Their characters have been submerged under the image they are trying to create, and it is only through performing that they can express themselves.

In the reprise of "One," the finale, the sparkling costumes and top hats provide a dramatic contrast to the industrial dress, as the chorus line forms, and the grass swing and hat trick. The New York Shakespeare Festival is currently a performance to inspire any wannabe stage star to "I can do that," while continuing against the rigors of a competitive industry.

dent Andrew's that no-one can end the fad. I think we will get cooperation from the town if it happens again.

People pedestrians from Hayward, the Eight and Hotel region) across the darkness, waves spreads still has a shortness of 2,500.

The report points other shortcomings, including a possible deficiency of close to 1.5 MGD if the Fellom reservoirs and the Bowers well fail again, even though another loss will be is serious.

It also states the town should immediately start work on an additional well, Number Six. Eight and Hotel recommend that construction be started as early as 1982.

Even though the report states the town could have future water trouble, Hayward executive maintains that the town can handle another similar occasion. He said a possible tie in with Shelley and the Quinton Reservoir are still being considered.

Did he feel he was, indeed, "getting something out of" the Roman Catholicism which he uses as the theme for his first LP? "No, what I'm saying is that Jesus Christ died for you and that should be enough, your total faith, not a self-gain philosophy," he said.

Carroll was slightly annoyed to hear that neither of the two books which led to his notoriety, "The Basketball Diaries" and "Living at the Movies," could be found in the Amherst area. "They aren't pushing that with the record enough," he said to drummer Woods with all the wrath of a business manager.

Carroll, who was originally signed to Rolling Stones Records, switched labels to the parent company, Atco, "because I didn't want to be tracking down Jagger in France for three weeks every time I wanted to do something. Rick and Keith aren't even speaking anymore. Bart Rotbaum, my producer, left the label and so now they don't even have a President at their company. The Rolling Stones are breaking up. There's a story for you." What can you add to that? I wept to my Springsteen wasn't the only hot act in town this weekend.

tive "hey" called out to me. It was Mr. Daley, who stood at the foot of our steps.

"Come here for a minute," he said.

I bounded down the steps and stood in front of Mr. Daley. He was an imposing old guy, and I squinted, squinting from the sun that was up over his shoulder.

"Here, I thought you might like these," he said, rolling two Mint Juleps into my cupped hands, as if they were dice. "Now, don't you go telling the other kids about these, you hear?"

I promised I wouldn't.

"And you keep playing baseball, too," Mr. Daley said. "When you get older, you'll be glad you did."

He bent over and lightly touched the bill of my baseball cap, then continued down the street.

Mr. Daley died sometime during the winter that year.

Last week, Dave Winfield said he wants to be paid $5 million a year to play baseball.

I'm sure glad Mr. Daley isn't here to see it all.

Matmen win, lose and tie in tourney

The University of Massachusetts wrestling team won one dual, Lafayette (35-12) tied one Rutgers (18-18) and lost one Princeton (35-10) in the tournament held this past weekend at Rutgers University.

Mike Carroll, Kevin Murphy and John Allen were three of three for the Minutemen over the weekend.

UMass wrestlers resume on Jan. 17 as Columbia in a dual meet that also includes CW Post and UT Hartford. They also travel to St. Lawrence and Albany next weekend.

Hoopwomen crush Catamounts, 105-74

Coach Mary Ann Gabarek's women's basketball team was ahead first at the 10 minute mark, held the lead and went on to defeat the Catamounts of Vermont 105-74 Saturday evening at UVM.

"They all played well," Gabarek said of the Minutewomen. "We shot very well in the first half (60 percent to Vermont's 38 percent) and everybody played good defense."

UMass now 3-3 had five women hitting double figures. Sherry Gallen led the scorers with 21 points, Julie Brady (16) Cindy Clapp (15), Wendy Wolf (14), and Ginger Logan (10).

Two days after Christmas, the Minutewomen resume their play with the Queen's Tournament. It is the first of 10 games played before classes resume in February. The tournament schedule includes four home games. Fordham (Jan. 12), UMaine (Jan. 16), UNH (Jan. 19) and Providence (Jan. 29).

Minutemen stumble in hoop tourney

By JONATHAN HAMILTON
Collegian Staff

NEW ROCHELLE, N.Y. — Perhaps head coach Ray Wilson said it best about his team's performance over the weekend.

"Our defense got us in a whole lot of trouble. Teams with an inside game are just moving us out from under the boards."

Wilson's remarks came after the University of Massachusetts basketball team finished last in the Manufacturer Hanover Classic. The Minutemen were drubbed in both games, losing to Dartmouth College, 86-70 Friday night and then falling in the consolation round to St. Francis (PA) 91-69. Both games with the exception of the first half against Dartmouth, showed that UMass must shore up its sagging defense.

In Friday night's action against the Big Green UMass demonstrated that they can run a ball control offense. The Minutemen were getting good performances from their inside men, Connie Nappier and center Edwin Green named to the All-tourney team. Defensively they countered well holding Dartmouth's big scoring threat Larry Lawrence tournament MVP to 10 first half points.

In the early going the lead changed hands many times as both teams exchanged baskets. Dartmouth, on the strength of forwards Matt Stewart and Paul Anderson rebounding gave the Big Green slight leads (16-12, 20-14) only to see them disappear as UMass hung close converting baskets when they needed them. The Minutemen then led briefly near then end of the half by as much as five (35-30) but Dartmouth whittled the lead to one as the buzzer sounded 39-38.

The second half proved to be fatal as a defensive collapse by the Minutemen aided an 18-4 spurt by the Big Green which put the game on ice.

At 15:31 of the period UMass was leading 51-47 and then in a matter of nine minutes they trailed by 10, 65-55. Lawrence took charge in the second half adding 19 points with several "in your faces" to boot. The senior center ended up with 29 points and seven rebounds while teammates Calvin Johnson had 15 and Paul Zanze 14. High man for UMass was Green with 20 points while Nappier contributed 10.

Matters went from bad to worse as UMass took it on the chin from St. Francis (PA) Saturday night. Four of the Red Flash were in double figures including Senior forward Charlie Kates who had 20 points and 12 rebounds. St. Francis never looked back after the opening tap as they built huge leads (34-15, 40-21) on the strength of their inside game as Kates and Paul Schoen (14 points, 10 rebounds) moved the UMass players out at will. At halftime the Flash was leading by 23, 48-25. UMass shot 40 percent from the field while the Flash was red hot hitting on 60 percent.

All-around UMass gymnast Tommy Thomson springs for the vault in Saturday's meet against the University of Syracuse. Gymnast Bob Gauthier won the all-around in the 244.25 — 241.7 UMass win. The men are now 3-0 on the year. (Staff photo by Vince DeWitt)

UNH gets by trackmen

By JANE WOLFSON
Collegian Staff

Despite capturing 10 out of a possible 16 first places, the University of Massachusetts men's track team fell to the University of New Hampshire 69-67 Friday night in Durham, N.H.

"It was an exciting meet," coach Ken O'Brien said. "Both teams performed well, and it was similar to last year when they beat us by only one point, (41-40)."

UMass led through the entire meet up until the third to last event, the 2 mile run. The Minutemen, plagued by injuries to their distance team, were only able to take third in the race, on the strenth of junior Frank Prial (9:28.2). UMass regained the lead following its victory in the mile relay. Running that relay were Bob Pearson (52.5) leading off, Brian Osborne (53.3), Bill DeVarney (52.2) and Rick Cady (51.3) running the anchor leg.

The meet came down to the final event, the two mile relay. The race was close with UNH winning with a time of 8:01 to 8:05.1 for UMass.

Other individual winners for UMass included: John Wright with another outstanding performance in the hurdles winning with a time of 7.5, as well as second in the 60 yard dash. Tom Lawrence with his first win in the 1,000 at 2:20.9, Mark Grasso's 45'21/4" jump to win the Triple Jump and another consistent 6.4 sprint for DeVarney to capture the dash.

Cady won the 440 with a time of 52.9. Kyle Martin and Jon Caffrey finished one and two in the mile run with times of 4:21.6 and 4:22.5 respectively. Freshman Brian Osborne took the 600 at 1:15.5 with co-captain Pearson third with 1:16.2.

Mike O'Neal won the long jump with a jump of 21'11", and in the weigh events sophomore Stephen Hyder won the 35 pound weight with a throw of 49'91/2", his best throw by nearly three feet. Tom Pirro took third in that event with a throw of 55'71/2". Hyder and Pirro also took second and third in the shotput with a 45'61/2" and 47'1/2".

UMass was shut out in both the pole vault and the 880 yard run.

The candy man

Kevin Cullen

Mr. Daley has been dead for about 13 years now. It doesn't seem that long, but it is.

When I was a kid, Mr. Daley was the most popular person in the neighborhood. He was an old guy, with a slow, easy way about him. He had a big red nose and wore one of those fedora hats that Bing Crosby used to wear. I really don't know whether Mr. Daley was bald or not, because he always wore a hat, even during the summer.

We'd usually see him round the corner at the top of the street, coming back from visiting old friends. Mr. Daley lumbered, walking slowly and always with effort. One of the kids would always yell out that he was coming, so we'd go running up to him. Mr. Daley used to love that.

Besides being a nice old guy, one reason Mr. Daley was so popular was because he always had candy.

Always.

The Larsen kids had no pride. They'd run, like dogs to a supper bell, and be the first ones at his side. The rest of us would gather pretty quickly and surround him.

Mr. Daley usually handed out Necco wafers. We didn't particularly like Necco wafers, but it was free and we were kids.

Once he had us, Mr. Daley would command an audience. And he always got one. During the summer, he'd make believe he was surprised that we weren't in school and we'd laugh at his feigned ignorance. Usually, though, he'd just talk to us about baseball. Mr. Daley loved baseball and he loved to tell stories.

"We didn't use gloves when I was a boy," Mr. Daley would say. "We played with our bare hands, and when you caught the ball it would sting and leave a red mark on your palms."

Mr. Daley saw Babe Ruth play, so we thought he was something. He saw the DiMaggios, and Williams and Robinson and even Ty Cobb.

"I saw Ruth in Boston, before he retired," Mr. Daley said. "He was with the Braves for a couple of years, and he was just playing out the string. He was sick, but he still played. He was dying, and he still had time for kids."

When any of the kids in the neighborhood got a new glove, they'd show Mr. Daley. He'd take the glove, examine it, turning it slowly in his hands, pulling at the webbing. He'd always nod and say it was a good one, even if it wasn't.

"You kids are lucky," Mr. Daley would tell us. "You can play baseball everyday. That's just about the best thing anyone could ever do."

We told Mr. Daley he could play baseball with us anytime he wanted, but he just laughed and said he was too old.

I had just climbed to the top of my stairs after getting some Necco wafers one afternoon when I heard a distinc-

NUMMO

VOLUME 9 ISSUE 15 — FALL SEMESTER 1980: — 15 DECEMBER 1980

CHANGES COMING DOWN

Gary Lee

"It's 1980 and ther ain't even no way back to 75, much less 1969. It's 1980, and ain't nobody asked me no time lately how're we gonna open the door to 1984" - (Gil Scott Heron)

As I look back on the semester which is coming to a close, I realize that four months is a small period of time when contrasted with the four or five years one usually spends here at UMass. And four months is pretty insignificant when contrasted to a life time, but with all that has gone on since the beginning of the 1980-81 academic year, on campus, in the valley, in America and throughout the world, it seems clear that the pace of events is going to be so hectic in the 80's that one could fill up a scrapbook with mementos of only a few weeks.

People of color on this campus were on the move in the cultural, political, social, and educational realms. We expressed our unity in the face of increasing psychological, physical and institutional attacks. Our culture was reinforced through some superb programming by many groups, most notably the Duke Ellington Committee (Ray Barretto y Jiminez Bros., Loose Caboose and Monyaka) and the Duke Ellington Music Series (Carmen McRae, Sonny Rollins). It is fitting that entities bearing Duke's name did him just by bringing such diverse and talented artists to this campus. The third World Theatre series had an outstanding two area production of 'Sugar', Black Girl') and world class theatre companies from outside ('Sizwe bansi is Dead', 'Gimme 5') There were also dance performances, (Afrikan-American Dance Theatre, Dance Theatre of Harlem, Monta Dance Company) and parties.

A number of events helped to supplement our classroom education and exposed our mis-education speeches, rallies, films, forums, and workshops can be called extra-curricular but they are a vital part of the learning experience. The September dedication of the W.E.B. DuBois Library brought some of the world's finest minds to this campus to remain here in the UMass library for all to use and be enlightened by.

Dick Gregory had everyone in stitches with his sharp humor, but the expressions turned to shock and disbelief and the Student Union Ballroom got quiet when Dick got serious. He made us all feel somewhat uneasy about our 'higher' education on the night of November 6th. We were proud of this Afrikan-American though, he who dared to speak his mind and tell the truth when the system makes it so easy to be lazy and dishonest.

Manuel Lee came to the next week and spoke about the Cuban people and their effort to reach out to the world's other peoples of color in solidarity. He exposed the hypocrisy of the Western press anti-Cuba propaganda.

Fall semester 1980 was a time of unity amongst the non white community in the valley, in spite of our differences and historical brainwashing we unified on a number of fronts for a number of causes. First there was the struggle against radio station WFCR and its management for its callous disregard for the Latin community by drastically cutting back the program 'Que tal Amigos' There were pickets, meetings, a takeover of Chancellor Kuller's office, and the formation of a public group to challenge the irresponsible decisions of people of the listening public at the Hampshire. This situation is a classic example of our task for the 80's, to fight to maintain the few gains that our predecessors won. The expressions of solidarity were beautiful to see and experience; the struggle was organized and led by Hispanics, but people of various backgrounds got involved.

Early in September there was a rally and silent vigil in Northampton in remembrance of Seta Rampersad, a UMass student who was left for dead in March 6, South Deerfield on September 13, 1979. Although the case is technically closed, it will never be closed in our minds and Seta will always live in our hearts.

Black Women's Week in early November brought together all peoples of color throughout the Valley. The week kicked-off with a parade and the high level of participation in the week's events helped rekindle community solidarity.

Many organization continued to provide strength and leadership and fostor unity. A few of these are: the Afrik-Am Society, Ahora, Asian Students Association, BMCP, Third World Caucus, NUMMO News, Black Affairs, the Center for Women of Color, these groups were bolstered by increased membership, the resolvement of many first-year students and community support. Our campus organizations are going to become an even more vital part of the university experience as the quality of education declines with increasing financial cutbacks.

King Edward, governor of Massachusetts, hastily disorganized- I mean reorganized higher education this summer. The results of his slipshod plan are huge fee increases, painful cuts in financial aid, and our administrations's continued stonewalling in contract negotiations with the valley. This series of events does not bode well for the future of us, non-whites and ominous education. It is a very scary time. The overall price of college skyrockets, financial aid funds dry up, enrollment falls off and teachers are laid off in those areas deemed expendable during retrenchment.

Within the U.S., events of the past four months (and throughout 1980) lead to the conclusion that we are under attack for just being black. Urban League President Vernon Jordan is back to work thankfully. He was shot in May and while the country worries about who shot J.R., Vernon's assailant is probably still at large, possibly somewhere in one of this country's illustrious intelligence agencies. Maniacs are on the loose in Buffalo and Atlanta, maniacs were set loose in Greensburg right the Ku Klux Klan in Scotland, Connecticut.

And then there was the 'election' (how about selection) of Ronnie and George. As brother Ujamaa so aptly put it, 'We've got Reagan and Bush today; CIA!' These fools are against busing, desegregation, human rights, popular rule, the Dept. of Education, the Civil Rights Act of 1964, etc. Because of their shining example, all the sick racist, sexist, ignorant animals who usually lurk beneath the surface and only occasionally pop up, are going to be coming out of the closet more frequently.

A BLACK NEWS SERVICE PUBLICATION

HELP

Thursday evening, December 11, after the NUMMO NEWS meeting, I accidently left a maroon, suede bag on top of the bar in the lobby of New Africa House. The next day when I returned to get the bag it wasn't there, but I wasn't worried because I knew one of the brothers or sisters would pick it up an return it to me.

Well, it has now been four days without a word, and I'm beginning to lose faith in the honesty of my people. If my bag cannot be returned, then the items inside were stolen from the trunk of my car before the fashion show last Sunday, in front of Memorial Hall. The bag was gift, but much more important, I can't see without my glasses, and as you all know, you can't do anything on this campus without a student ID.

If anyone has any knowledge of the whereabouts of my bag or stereo, please return to the Afro-Am Office, or contact me at 545-2336. Please don't let me lose the faith, especially during Kwanza.

BMCP PHONOTHON

On Friday December 19, 1980 at 6:00pm the Black Mass Communications Project will sponsor a 24-hr special programwhich will go until Saturday Dec. 20, at 6:00pm. The 24-hr special is in conjuction with BMCP's tenth anniversary. Though overshadowing the anniversary is the fact that this will be a telethon for the Lomax and Owens Defense fund. This will include special public affairs briefings on the Lomax and Owens case. Pledges will be taken at the following phone numbers: 545-2425, 545-2876, 545-2877. Mail all pledges to Lomax and Owens defense fund, in care of the Black Mass Communications Project, 402 Student Union Building, University of Massachusetts, Amherst, Massachusetts, 01003.

BLACK LEGACY

by Ria Duran

1 Today most peole know that Alexander Graham Bell is credited with inventing the telephone. Not many people know that Lewis Howard Latimer designed and assisted Bell in prepaapplinor the er was a black man.

2 In the sixties, young people used a method of fighting segregation in public places. This was called the "sit-in". But like most things, the "sit-in" was not new. The first "sit-in" on record occurred in May of 1871 in Louisville, Kentucky. Black teenagers staged a "sit-in" to protest segregated horse-drawn streetcars, and won.

3 The use of a writing utensil known to many as a fountain pen is rapidly becoming antiquated. It is a well designed writing instrument containing an ink reservoir that automatically feeds the writing point. W.B. Purvis invented a fountain pen in 1884. He was a Black man.

4 You know there is a great shortage of black doctors in this country. But the first Black physian on record in America was James Derham. In 1762 Derham was born a slave. After gaining his freedom, he practied as a doctor. He set up his own medical practice. James Derham was the first Black doctor on all a friend or a business firm and get a recording or a signal to leave a message. Well, this is because of a unique gadget invented by Benjamin F. Thornton of Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, in 1930. So let it be known that Benjamin F. Thornton, inventor of the automatic answering service was a Black man.

1980 : HOTTER THAN JULY

Curtis Haynes

For many people, the University of Massachusetts, has been a first experience away from home, and away from the shelter of parents and community. These people have come to the University of Massachusetts to get a education (no matter what their major) which could help them better survive in this world. Because of the current situations, world wide,it is now, more important than ever, for these people to realize that their education MUST include learning about all people of the world:

Today, there are over FOUR BILLION people in this world, and because of past events in history, a system has been built which has divided these people into sub-divisions called nations, religions, states, races, or what ever a person chooses to, or is forced to associate himself with.I live in the United States of America, and I am FORCED to remember the color of my skin.

My ancestors come from Africa; the cradle of all civilization.From Africa they spread to all the corenerns of the world; Europe, Asia, and the Americas.

Those who lived in Africa were black, those from Europe were white, from the Americas they were red, and in Asia, they were yellow. When my ancestors lived in their own countries the color of their skins did not affect their way of life.

However, they did not stay in their own countries. Those from Europe "discovered" Africa, Asia and the Americas. At first, they accepted each other for who they were. The Europeans, who were the "explorers"at the time, were traders and they traded with Africans, Asians,and American Indians. At one point some of those Europeans got greedy, and instead of trading they decided to take what they had "discovered". From the Africans they took the gold and the diamonds. They justified by calling Africans 'savages' and associating them with evil. From the Asians, who were also supposedly inferior they took the silks, and the tea. Those who were powerful in Europe were able to enjoy this new wealth. Those who were not powerful went to the Americas and they decided to share the land with the American Indians. This sharing did not last long as some Europeans got greedy and decided to take this land. They justified this because to them Indians were ' savages'. With this newly acquired land, the Europeans, now calling themselves Americans began to build. To help them build, these Americans went to Africa and stole Africans from their homeland. They called these Africans slaves. They went to China and imported Chinese at slave wages. They called them chinks. They did what they wanted to these people, raped, beat, murdered, all because they were considered property and sub-human. At this time American Indians were put on reservations and were no longer allowed to call the Americas their home.

Then came the Civil War and Africans were set "free", but they were set free in a country that now, was controlled completely by powerful whites, in an American system which had already been built.THIS WAS THE FOUNDATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

¿Now it is 1980, and as a result of past exploitations, we are living in a racist, class system of inequality. Extremely rich, powerful, whites are at the " top' of the world and they will manipulate the system so that they will stay at the 'top'.

It is 1980 and people all over the world are SCREAMING for the equality that is deserving for all living things on this earth.

¡It is 1980 and we, students at the University of Massachusetts, must realize that if we are to survive, this survival must include the survival of all people. If education is a key to a better life, it is a key to a better life for ALL people. We must use it as such.

.It is 1980, and we must be serious because it is hot, as Stevie Wonder would put it: "IT IS HOTTER THAN JULY".

CENTER FOR WOMEN OF COLOR FASHION SHOW

Deanna McRae

On Sunday December 7, 1980 many of us were priviledged to experience the First Annual International Dinner and Fashion Show presented by the Center for Women of Color. Commentator for the gala event was Marlene Duncan.The music was provided by sisters Leslie Harrison and Caryl Williams.

The first segment was entitled, "Asia, Journey Through the Orient". What a journey! Fashions from China, Viet Nam, Philippines and Korea were modeled. Native women aparels were modeled as well as costumes of rulers and emperors and their wives and lovers. A poem read by Roberta Uno expressed the aspirations and spirit of the Asian peoples.

We were then enchanted with a "Return to the Motherland" a journey through the continent of Africa. Fashions including dashikis, gara lupus, worn by the women of West Africa, bebuiches (shoes from Morocco) and adornments of corri shells. Poetry was read by brother Kari Nijiri and sister Marlene Duncan, who ended this segment with Maya Angeloris' 'Still I Rise'.

The beats of the congas and bongos, and the chanting of social and political information began the final segment on Latin America. Our hispanic brothers and sisters danced "La Plena" and involved the audience in the dance. Hands clapped, voices cheered and everyone talked about how beautiful and enjoyable the entire afternoon had been

The Five College BWAAIA Celebration held Saturday December 13, was highlighted by the lighting of the Seven Candles representing the Seven Principles of the BOLSA, BABA. There was Food and Feasting, and Celebration at this all-day event.

THE POVERTY OF BLACK PROTEST REVISITED : A CRITQUE

PART II

Steve Cozier

In Part I of "The Poverty of Current Black Protest Revisited: Critique of the Poverty of Current Black Protest" I was responding to an earlier Nummo article by Winston Smith. In this article (Part I) I would like to move beyond this and outline a general critique, or brevity, of the poverty of current Black Protest.

When considering these vital concerns, "The Poverty of Current Black Protest" (Smith), "The Crisis of the Negro Intellectual" (Hill), "The Political Apathy of Black People" (various theorists), etc. we must be cognizant of "many" things as such. We must be aware of the objective and material conditions of existence of society, its general mode of production and social form, the structures and process of a society's (i.e. social division of labor, material life or its manner production, urban into a via rural life, etc.) class, major forms of alienation and antagonism as well (i.e. racism, sexism, ageism, etc.) their part of the structure. The nature and relation of ideology and practice, the class divisions in society, the basic contradictions of society, etc. In the United States of America there is great eclecticism and heterogeneity with diverse ethnicities, cultures, religions, classes, etc. In fact, many diversity that no one society in history. A knowledge of history is paramount. How did the Afro-American People arise in their current status? We must know history, not only of our people (though this is most crucial!) but of all peoples. "If we are to decipher the origins of this status, the various structures and meaning of racism, exploitation and domination, their reproduction in American Society, and the reproduction of the totality of the society itself.

Naturally, the historical subjects of Capitalism, Imperialism, and Colonialism emphasize much of the phenomenon.

Before analyzing the poverty of current Black Protest and delineating as critique of this phenomenon a brief historical review is in order. Of course there is not the space here to construct a social history of race relations in the Western World in general and United States in particular. But certain points be made of the fundamental problem of racism and its roots in the inception and system of Black Chattel Slavery. Practically all forms of racism (e.g. individual, institutional - societal, etc.) concomitantly with the establishment and extension of White Supremacy, can be traced to slavery. The rise of all these features, most historically specific to the Bourgeois Period, informs that slavery to racism we find and historical a social and economic system of exploitation. As a socio-economic system of organization this engenders that the practical concerns engender both race and class elements. This is the subject of great emphasis and contention. There are, on the one hand, those more Orthodox in their orientation who explain the phenomena exclusively from the vantage point of class (class reductionist), while on the other hand, there are both certain Cultural Nationalists and Bourgeois Social Scientists who explain the phenomena exclusively from the vantage point of race (race-reductionist). Those reductionists both are blind t o the material conditions of existence and material reality, the first more obviously so since the materialist undergird of the latter is more tenuous. Woodard, in "The Political Economy of Race and Class" it is race and racism that is such an irrational and divergent feature of modern global culture as to defy analysis."

In understanding the strong Black Protest tradition, in proceeding with the total historical survey we must allow sweeping mention to "the revolution (reflected in) and celebration) American minorities in regard to slavery and race relations (see Political Economy, Steve Tobak, and Culture Group). The essence, meaning and magnitude of the Civil War (as War Between the States or Second American Revolution), the Post-Reform-Civil War context of Radical and/or Black Reconstruction, the Post-Reform-Civil War context of Radical and/or Black Reconstruction, the Post-Reform-Civil War context of Radical and/or Black Reconstruction,

SOUTH AFRICAN MILITARY FORCES PREPARE WITH NUKES AND BLACK RECRUITMENT

South Africa's - Military Forces Prepares with Nukes and Black Recruitment

The long war in Zimbabwee came to an end in 1980. The Namibian conflict, where up to 70,000 South African troops have faced querrillas fighting for independence, just might come to an end next year, should current diplomatic efforts stay on track. In South Africa itself, however, the war may just be beginning, South African military officers have been telling citizens around the country in recent briefings.

According to the December 1st issue of the African News " Incresed guerrilla actions as well as continued unrest could be expected, Brigadier A. Potgieter told one such gathering in Fort Beaufort, eastern Cape, which was attended by the Christian Science Monitor's Gary Thatcher." Potgieter explained the governments strategy for a 'total response' including political reforms and 'sound race relations'. But a more conventional stress of military preparedness is also on the agenda.

Within the military field, South Africa's planners have emphasized developing the capacity to fight a mechanized counter insurgency war with heavy reliance on retiatory air strikes against neighboring countries, and extensive use of mobile air attack troops. The escalation of conventional firepower shows no sign of stopping.

There has been a substaintial increase in manpower within the South African Defence Force, rising from a total of 78,000 in 1960 to an increase of 494,000 in 1979, this total includes South Africa's civilians, Commandos, The Citizen Force (which has remained th largest group since 1974), National Service and the Permanent Force.

In recent years South Africa has also focused on high technology the development of a nuclear capacity for example and, on the other end of the spectrum, expanding the military manpower pool by turning to the recruitment of blacks (white males are already subject to the draft).

Expert opinion is agreed that South Africa now possesses the capability to produce nuclear weapons, but a debate still persist over whether a test device has actually been exploded. Following a mysterious South explosion detected by the U.S. Vela satelite had indeed, as was its function, detected a nuclear blast, and some experst attributed it to South African or joint Israeli-South Africa venture. A scientific panel convened by the white house, however eventually relesed a report in July inquiring that the evidence was inconclusive and suggested instead that a freak micrometeoroid collision with the satelite may have been responsible.

In the latest episode in the controversy over the Setember 22nd blast, Britains "World in Action" television program in an October 21 broadcast, reviewed the evidence and concluded that the blast was most likely a tactical nuclear device fired by the extended range 155 mm Howitzer supplied to South Africa by the U.S.-Canadian Space Research Corporation. The estimated height of the explosion, "World in Action" claimed, citing an unpublished CIA report, was 8 kilometers, approximately the maximum height of th extended range 155 shell. "World in Action" also asserted, without further detail, that one of Space Research Corporations nuclear scientist visited South Africa in September 1979.

While the nuclear threat might prove some deterrent in a showdown with independent African countries, it is of little use in counter-insurgency campaigns such as that in northern Namibia, or in combating guerrilla actions spotted throughout South Africa's own urban and rural areas, where, in spite of apartheid (pronounced "apart-hate", and it means "apart-ness - separation)", whites and blacks cone in daily contact in the ordinary workings of the economy.

In the last year in line with its internal settlement policy, South Africa has been transferring military command to authorities in Windhoek. In August an estimated 20,000 troops were transferred, and in October it was announced that national service for all races in South-West Africa-Namibia would be introduced in January 1981.

§ In South Africa, the government has equiped each homeland declared independent with its own military force, under command of South African officers on loansome 1,000 each in Franskei and Bophuthatswa, and a smaller number in Venda. Until this year, African recruits to the South African Defence Force itself were concentrated in the 21 Batallion, which consists of approximatly 600 soldiers, but in May the establishment of four new ethnic batallions (Swazi, Venda, Shangaan and Zula) was announced. The units would be stationed in border areas where each ethnic group is concentrated.

Though many blacks may be drawn into the army by economic need or by conscription, public sentiment in their communities is strongly opposed to military service for the government. In the end, Pretoria's strategy may backfire, providing its guerrilla foe with a new source of intellegence information and, ultimately recruittst

Even though the nedia presents the military capacity ooeouth africa to be extremly great, complete with international military support from other western states with "vital economic interest" in South Africa there is not the slightest indication that the South African military and intellegence forces can contain the escalation of guerrilla war fare, inside the country. Regardless of the military prepareness or the contingency plans, projected by the South African government, to handle an internal military crisis. This has not dampened or fritened the Liberation Movement.

ALCOHOL EDUCATION PROJECT

The Alcohol Education Program (AEP) is a student funded program sponsored by the University Health Services Division of Community Health Education. The commitment of the AEP is to promote a campus environment that encourages responsible drinking.

The Goals of the program are:

1) To increase the awareness of all students about the effects of alcohol on our bodies, environment, and relationships.

2) To reduce the occurence of alcohol-related socially disruptive behavior among students such as personal and property damage, disruptive behavior and drinking while intoxicated

3) To reduce the occurence of alcohol-related personally and interpersonally disruptive behavior among students such as long-term health problems, acute physical injuries, disruptive interpersonal relationships, and disruptive academic/career performance.

The program has hired and trained eight (8) students, four of whom are Third World persons to act as alcohol peer educators in order to attain these goals. To reach the UMass Community, the alcohol peer educators provide workshops on topics such as alcohol physiology, alcohol and values, sex roles and alcohol, how to help a problem drinker, stress and the Third World Community, and others.

The AEP peers also work with the community through outreach efforts such as needs assessments, media messages, educational displays, and special projects.

The philosophy at the program is to work with the UMass Community, including the Third World Community, in order that its needs are met for the prevention of alcohol-related problems. Therefore, it would be seriously counter-productive for the Third World Community not to take advantage of these activities for the development of the Third World people.

The Third World staff are meeting with the community representatives to assess their needs and to plan activities, as well as projects around these needs.

As members of the third World Community, we welcome your suggestions and involvement in this process. We encourage you to utilize our services for constructive development of ourselves and our community.

For more information about workshops and community development activities, please contact us at the Health Education Office, 549-2671.

Hoping to hear from you,
The Third World Staff of the AEP:
Roxana Bell, Claude Anthony Pierre, Carol Young, and Gail Hart

HINES WON'T STAND TRIAL

Tommie Lee Hines, a mentally retarded Black man whose case has been the focus of antiracist protests over the years, has been declared incom petent to stand trial on charges of raping a white woman.

The Nov. 21 decision by a jury of eleven whites and one Black in Birmingham, Ala., thus temporarily blocks a new trial for Hines. After listening to psychiatric evidence and testimony showing Hines having difficulty answering simple questions, the jury declared him unable to be put on trial.

An appeals court last March overturned Hines' conviction on an earlier rape charge on the grounds that he could not have voluntarily given his alleged "confession" because of his mental age. Health care specialists said Hines has the intellectual capacity of a 5-year-old.

After the jury's decision, Judge Charles Cowder ordered Hines sent to a state mental hospital "until he's found competent to stand trial." The Black man's supporters and family say they will try to get Hines released and eventually cleared of all charges.

Civil rights groups and other antiracist forces in Alabama have held a number of demonstrations and protests ever since Hines was first charged in 1978. Some of the protests have led to clashes with counterdemonstrators led by the Alabama Ku Klux Klan.

An Alabama district attorney said the prosecution may appeal the jury's decision.

ESKIMOS REACT ANGRILY TO FEDERAL WHALING RESTRICTION REQUEST

The chairman of the Alaska Eskimo Whaling Commission reacted angrily to a Federal Government request that the Eskimos' hunting of bowhead whales be stopped immediately. In a telegram to Interior Under Secretary James Joseph, who had asked the Eskimo Whalers to end their fall subsistence hunt immediately, Chairman Jacob Adams accused the agency of shirking its responsibilities and allowing its policies to be dictated by special interest groups. The Eskimos have exceeded the quota set by the International Whaling Commission, of which the United States is a member. The Eskimos contend that the number of bowheads has been underestimated., They have refused to accept the IWC quota and have set their own much higher quota. Joseph, in his telegram to the Eskimos, said that the Eskimos by exceeding the IWC quota were violating United States Law. He said, "I am deeply concerned about the consequences to the future of your people if the whaling continues this fall".

VOTING RIGHTS: NEW TRIAL ORDERED

A federal district judge in Mobile, Ala., recently ordered a new trial in a civil right suit challenging the city's racially discriminatory "at-large" voting procedure.

The case stems from a class action lawsuit filed several years ago charging that the at large voting method in the city unconstitutionally discriminated against Blacks by diluting their voting strength. The suit requested that a single-member district voting system be implemented.

The U.S. Supreme Court last April overturned favorable rulings. It said that such at-large systems can only be changed when it is shown they were set up intentionally to discriminate against Blacks. The court sent the case back to the Mobile district court. No date has been set yet for the new trial.

As a result of the Supreme Court's ruling, two Black members of Mobile's school board, whose election was due to the district voting system, were immediately dismissed.

The Supreme Court decision was considered landmark, because it threatened future Black voting rights cases against the discriminatory at-large method. Blacks are hopeful that the new trial may lead to a favorable ruling.

NORTH CAROLINA CHEROKEES WIN TAX CASE

The U.S. Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals has ruled that the State of North Carolina and Swain County have no authority to levy taxes on Indians living on the Qualla Reservation. The court ruling held that since land of the Qualla Reservation is held in trust by the federal government, there must be permission by Congress before the State or its political subdivisions may tax Indians living on the reservation. North Carolina is reportedly the only state that has held that the state could tax Indians living within the state borders even though those Indians are part of a federally recognized tribe.

PAY RAISES: INFLATION TAKES IT ALL

The average pay of an American worker went up 8.1. in 1979, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported last week. But inflation rose at a 13.3. rate.

Average annual pay stood at $13,137 for the average U.S. worker; but there were wide regional variations. The average in Mississippi, for instance, is only $10,176, the lowest in the country.

The Census Bureau also reports that some 700,000 more people slipped into official poverty last year, mainly among the elderly. There are some 15 million people below the poverty line, 3.6 million of them over 65 years of age.

Committee discusses plans to merge Boston campuses

By SAMUEL CHALFEN
Collegian Staff

In an effort to reorganize public college campuses in Boston, a special task force of the Board of Regents held public hearings yesterday on two proposals to merge the University of Massachusetts at Boston with Boston State College.

The first proposal, named "the Corrigan Plan" after UMass Boston Chancellor Robert A. Corrigan, would absorb Boston State College into UMass-Boston. Mark Horan, an assistant to UMass President David C. Knapp, and a former UMass Amherst student, said no new Board of Trustees would be needed for the combined school.

Under the second plan, the two would be combined into a new city university. The city university would require new governance procedures and greater reorganization efforts, Horan said.

"Reputation is cumulative," Corrigan said at the hearing, "and reputation for an educational institution is crucial. A change of name and governance at this stage would be extremely destructive to the educational opportunities of the people of the greater Boston area."

Corrigan also said ties with the Amherst campus are advantageous to the Boston campus.

There have also been reports that faculty and administration at the Amherst campus fear the merger may lead to a decrease in funding and graduate opportunities for this campus, Horan said.

The president (Knapp), the Board of Trustees, no one is making plans to start taking funds away from the Amherst campus and bring them to Boston," Horan said.

The task force also heard plans for a proposed merger of the Roxbury Community College into the Bunker Hill Community College.

Strong opposition to the merger was heard from the black population and from clergymen, educators and legislators, the Associated Press reported.

Horan said the task force would probably make a recommendation to the Board of Regents within the next two or three months.

Low water levels threaten supply for summer, fall

By JOSEPH BARRETT
Collegian Staff

Amherst Town Manager A. Louis Hayward yesterday said Amherst water levels remain low despite yesterday's rainfall, which he described as "the first good rain we've had since the snow in November."

Hayward said he notified Hampshire and Amherst College officials as well as those at the University of Massachusetts to maintain conservation efforts in a memorandum last week.

"There is certainly no crisis at the present time," Hayward said. "We certainly can deliver adequate supply, but the concern is that the reservoirs should be full now."

Hayward said "What we have had is an extended drought period in this area, according to the scientists. Our levels must go up by around March and April, in order to insure adequate supply for the summer and into the fall."

Amherst Superintendent of Public Works Stanley Ziomek said the level in the Pelham Reservoir was down two and a half feet below normal. Hills and Atkins Reservoirs were down about four and a half feet, he said.

The Atkins reservoir is the largest in town and is the one that most concerns Ziomek and Hayward.

"It's the Atkins Reservoir that we really need to go up by the spring," Hayward said.

On September 3, 1980 the water levels in Amherst sank below the critical level until they were almost dry, forcing Hayward to delcare an emergency and request the evacuation of 14,000 UMass students to ease the demand. The students returned to school at the end of the weekend, but the water ban remained in effect until December 15.

The Lawrence Swamp Well in South Amherst was completed a month after last year's crisis, further boosting Amherst's water storage capacity. Yet the levels remained low throughout the year and still remain low.

Last summer was the driest and hottest in recent history according to Philip Ives of the Amherst College Weather Station. Ziomek said that December and January were also very dry months. He said yesterday's rainfall was a "welcome one."

Yesterday's rainfall amounted to 1.2 inches. A few showers were expected within the next twenty-four hours.

Reagan administration proposes cutbacks in financial aid funding

By ED LEVINE
Collegian Staff

Although former President Jimmy Carter had proposed budget increases for federal financial aid programs, Ronald Reagan's administration is reported to be considering drastic cuts in aid funding.

Secretary of Education Terrel H. Bell last week said the administration was preparing to make cuts in both the student loan programs and the Pell (Basic Educational Opportunity) Grants. Bell, according to an article published last week in the New York Times, is said to be considering the cuts as part of drastic budget cutting measures proposed by the new president.

In his budget, released shortly before he left office, President Carter proposed across the board increases in financial aid programs and supported the passage of supplemental funding to keep the Pell Grant program going this year.

Due to a recent change in education laws, more students are now eligible to receive the Pell Grants but additional funding was not provided to accomodate the increase. The Department of Education estimated that an additional $811 million is needed to continue the program through the end of this fiscal year in June.

University of Massachusetts Financial Aid Director Ed C. Apodaca predicts that cuts would be necessary if the additional funding is not approved. About 4,000 UMass students receive a total of $2.5 million in Pell Grant funds, he said.

In his budget proposal, Carter offered to increase the Pell Grant allocation for fiscal year 1982 by about $66 million to $2.752 billion. If this level is approved, the maximum grant would rise $50 to $1,800, but the Department of Education has estimated that about 20,000 less students will receive the aid nationally.

Carter also proposed a $30 million hike in Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grant funding, to $400 million, and suggested $286 million to fund the National Direct Student Loan program. About $235 billion of the total $6.4 billion aid budget would be earmarked for Guaranteed Student Loans.

Officials of the Reagan administration and members of Congress have proposed to institute tuition tax credits to parents to make up for the loss in aid. Under the various plans, parents would be able to deduct a certain percentage of tuition payments from their federal income tax payments.

Already, 12 bills have been filed in the 96th Congress to provide for tuition tax credits. One bill, House 380, sponsored by Rep. Thomas A. Luken, D-Ohio, would allow parents to deduct 25 percent of tuition costs for a maximum of $200 in 1982 rising to $400 in 1984. Other bills suggest similar percentages and levels.

During his campaign, Reagan had supported tuition tax credits and a pledge to institute them is offered in the platform of the Republican party. During his tenure, Carter had opposed and promised to veto any tuition tax credit bills passed by Congress.

Apodaca said the problem with the tax credit plans is that it is designed to aid primarily parents of students attending private institutions. He said lower income people would be hurt by such plans.

Joseph Forte, head of the Students Advocating Financial Aid group at UMass, which formed following a lobbying trip to Washington last November, said tax credits would especially hurt independent students who pay for their own educations but do not pay income tax.

Reagan charges sting Kremlin

By THOMAS KENT
Associated Press Writer

MOSCOW — The Soviet Union has been severely stung by Reagan administration claims that the Kremlin is in league with international terrorists and has struck back angrily at what it calls an "anti-Soviet campaign" in the United States.

Senior Western diplomats here said yesterday that Soviet officials have dispensed with any idea they might have had about extending a "honeymoon" period to the new foreign policy team in Washington. The diplomats predicted virtually every American charge against Moscow will be rebutted.

A special statement issued yesterday by the Soviet Union news agency Tass said "any allegations about the Soviet Union's involvement in terroristic activities represent a gross and malicious deception. They cannot but cause feelings of indignation and legitimate protest in the Soviet people."

The statement began, "Soviet leading circles have taken note of a new anti-Soviet hostile campaign being unfolded in the United States." This indicated the statement was approved at the highest official levels.

A senior West European envoy said the Tass comment "goes beyond the level of ordinary propaganda, and is a very serious thing."

The news agency statement was a partial response to last Wednesday's allegation by Secretary of State Alexander M. Haig, Jr. that the Soviet Union supports policies that "foster, support and expand international terrorism."

Some Western diplomats here said they saw Haig's stance and Reagan's comment Thursday — that Soviet leaders reserve the right "to commit any crime, to lie, to cheat," — as legitimate expressions of American irritation with Soviet policies.

One envoy said it is pointless to be polite in public statements when world realities are grim.

Others, however, believe that the escalating war of words will only aggravate SovietAmerican relations already strained over, among other things, the presence of Soviet troops in Afghanistan.

They cite the prominent media play given the U.S. pronouncements.

Moscow has also used diplomatic channels to complain to Washington.

The ranking American diplomat here, Charge d'Affaires Jack F. Matlock, was called to the Foreign Ministry last Thursday to hear a protest over U.S. condemnation of the Soviet media's handling of the U.S.Iran hostage crisis.

On Monday, Soviet and American officials confirmed that embassy officers were summoned "recently" to the Foreign Ministry, and U.S. sources said the session dealt with the terrorism issue. The session was believed to have taken place yesterday.

Towns threaten attack on budget

By STEVEN A. COHEN
Associated Press Writer

BOSTON — An association representing 90 percent of the cities and towns in Massachusetts threatened warfare with the King administration over local aid yesterday, while a legislative committee took the first step in helping communities cope with Proposition 2½.

The Local Affairs Committee, following a hearing, quickly approved three bills giving communities extra time in setting their budgets for the fiscal year beginning July 1.

The bills, now headed for the floor, would extend the May 31 deadline a month. Approval by the full Legislature and Gov. Edward J. King is expected.

King and James W. Segel, executive director of the Massachusetts Municipal Association, held back-to-back news conferences Monday, presenting widely different views of Prop. 2½'s impact and the responsibility it imposes on the state.

"This association and its members will not sit as spectators watching the dismantling of local government and the dissolution of vital services to our citizens," Segel said.

He claimed that budget cuts required in some communities under the property tax cutting 2½ law will approach 30 percent, and King's budget recommendations filed with the Legislature last week were "oblivious to the unprecedented problems" facing local governments.

"Failure by the state's executive branch to perceive this crisis and act upon it is a flagrant abdication of responsibility, unparalleled in recent state history," Segel said.

The municipal association wants King's budget rewritten by the Legislature, funding the state at current levels and allowing some $300 million in state tax growth to flow to the communities.

Reagan says troops will stay in South Korea

By GEORGE GEDDA
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON — President Ronald Reagan pledged to South Korean President Chun Doohwan yesterday that the United States would not reduce the level of its troops in South Korea or the Pacific.

"We shall maintain the strength of our forces in the Pacific area," Reagan said as he and Chun finished a White House meeting.

Standing outside the White House with Reagan at his side, Chun said: "President Reagan gave me firm assurances that the United States has no intention of withdrawing its forces from Korea. I am pleased that the present level of U.S. military forces in Korea will be maintained."

Reagan promised that the United States would maintain similar alliances with the Pacific nations as will "our European allies."

Chun, arriving at the White House shortly before 11 a.m. in a driving rainstorm, was greeted by Reagan and by Vice President George Bush, who escorted Chun inside for his hour long meeting with Reagan.

Registration runs well for all but 'idiots'

By TIMOTHY J. FOWLER
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts students are accustomed to the long lines and headaches associated with setting in during the first few days of each semester, but they did not encounter the usual hassles at the Housing and Registrar's offices yesterday.

Spokespersons for both of these departments said they had no major problems and that everything was running smoothly.

Jerry Quarles, director of the Housing Office said, "We have some walk-in traffic, but basically everything's going very well.

"We have 500 more people on campus this semester than we usually do, and we only have 17 open spaces on campus for men and 140 for women, but we have enough room for everyone so far, so it hasn't been a problem," he said.

"The office is quiet and you wouldn't know this is the Housing Office because there aren't any lines or people screaming in here," Quarles said.

Daniel Fitzpatrick of the Registrar's office said, "We've had some 15 minute lines, mostly kids who paid their bills late, but we haven't had any real big problems here.

"It's been going pretty good," he said "ever since we've done registration in Whitmore instead of in Boyden gym.

"This is the second year we've done it here because we're so dependent on computers, and it's run pretty smoothly this way," Fitzpatrick said.

Fitzpatrick said the lines, which are small this semester when compared to previous years, are caused by the approximately 2,500 students who registered late and by "the idiots who've lost their schedules or something like that."

Federal Aid

After only two weeks in office, Ronald Reagan has begun setting priorities for federal spending, but apparently student financial aid is not very high on his list.

The Reagan administration, in an effort to trim the budget and reduce federal spending, has targeted financial aid programs for budget cutbacks and proposed replacing them with income tax credits for tuition-paying parents.

Last week, Secretary of Education Terrel H. Bell announced that cuts will soon be made in the student loan and Pell Grant (Basic Education Opportunity Grant) Programs. In their place, administration officials and members of Congress have proposed tax credits which would allow parents to deduct from 25 to 50 percent of the cost of their child's tuition from their income tax payment.

But tax credits are not the answer for everyone.

Since the credit awarded is a percentage of tuition cost, students in private schools will naturally benefit more than those in public institutions. Generally, higher income families, who can afford private schools, will benefit more than lower and middle income people.

Tax credits will also not be much help to independent, self-supporting students who pay for their own educations and, in many cases, pay little or no income tax.

Even before any cuts are made, the Pell Grant program is already in trouble.

[illegible] more students eligible to receive [illegible] Department of Education [illegible] $411 million short of what is needed. [illegible] to this year's payments are [illegible] of the additional money is not [illegible]

[illegible] Bell announced that the [illegible] receive cuts in their student aid [illegible] seems to not make sense [illegible] Congress talked of approving supplemental funds, preferring at one point [illegible] cuts in aid and ways to restore them [illegible]

Now that Reagan has made his feeling known, it remains to be seen if Congress goes into the education budget to [illegible] or approves additional funds [illegible] proposed by the president. [illegible]

Apparently, although Reagan wants to help Americans and says [illegible] needy ones, he has [illegible] and employees of America [illegible] figure.

[illegible] Stanton did not just hand out forms yesterday. As she sat at the rainy entrance, she was required to answer all questions, ranging from knowing where the registration line was, to how to clear up a late fee, to where the Whitmore bathrooms are.

"We get a brief summary on what to do with adds and drops," she said. "But it seems like you have to know more than that."

There was none of that question and answer hubbub from last semester, none of that show-me-I'll-control-your-mess-at-add-drop-forms business that had people fishing their students from stairwells all without an add-drop form [illegible] said, laughing at the thought. "I wish I had some towels so people could wipe their hands. If the forms get wet and bubble up, they can't go through the scanner that reads them."

"Can you fold them?" a kid asked, taking a form from Anita Stanton.

"Well," she said, "try not to mangle it."

Oscar Peterson gave a solo piano concert Sunday evening at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall.

Oscar Peterson delivers classic, inspiring recital

By ROB HOFFMAN
Collegian Staff

Oscar Peterson
FAC Concert Hall, Feb. 1, 1981

Remarkable virtuousity, warmth and exuberance combined to make Oscar Peterson's solo piano recital at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall a pleasure and an inspiration.

The near-capacity audience was treated to a performance in the classic concert tradition. Peterson stood and bowed after each piece, and seemed quite pleased with the enthusiastic response to his eclectic improvisations.

As on his most recent recording Digital At Montreux (Pablo D2308224), Peterson began with the Dedette Hill/Willard Robison composition "Old Folks". The metamorphosis carried out during this tune introduced the enraptured audience to the variety of styles which this veteran pianist is fluent with. Most of the standards which Peterson played were similarly arranged-ballads evolved into ragtime excursions with the mighty stride style of his left hand and the steady rhythm of his metronomic foot shaking the massive concert hall, while a modal piece such as "Dahoud" was transformed briefly into a strict-time classical style. The second song of the evening was "On the Sunny Side of the Street," played in a manner evocative of a carnival or bistro. The fast ragtime finale to this song was breathtaking.

The first half of the show also included spontaneous arrangements of Bill Evans' "Waltz For Debby", "(Back Home Again In) Indiana", and "City Lights", an original which Peterson said was for a new Jazz Ballet which he has been composing.

"Body and Soul" was the standard that Peterson chose to begin the second half of the evening's music. Citing the versions by Coleman Hawkins and The Manhattan Transfer, Peterson launched his dramatic rendition of this classic tune.

"Blues of the Prairie", and "Hogtown Blues", a pair of sketches from Peterson's landmark Canadiana Suite were performed as a medley, though the composer/pianist quietly left the titles of these tunes unannounced.

Certainly the highlight of the second set, and a staple of the Peterson repertoire, was the extended medley of tunes written or made famous by Duke Ellington. Articulate and tantalizing, daring the listener to guess which tune he would segue into next, Sunday's medley included "Lush Life", "Take The 'A' Train", "Satin Doll," "I Got It Bad," "Solitude," and "Caravan." Backstage after the performance, Peterson confessed that his medleys and indeed all of his sets were unplanned. He lets the spirit of the evening move him, which it clearly did on this inspired occasion. The Ellington medley ended the second set, but loud audience approval made an encore inevitable. Peterson returned to the stage for a bouncy interpretation of "Our Love is a Simple Thing."

Oscar Peterson is a master of the keys, though by his own estimation he is "a performer who has a thing to do every night." In five days he will be doing his thing in Japan, and three weeks later he will be doing the same in Australia.

When he isn't touring, Peterson experiments at home with electronic music.

"One enhances the other," he said, referring to the relationship between his experiments at home and his live work. Perhaps someday this exceptional musician will expose the world to a synthesized "Satin Doll"!

EFFECTIVE COMMUNICATION HAS ALWAYS BEEN IMPORTANT.

Man learned at a very early age that good ideas have to be heard to be effective. So he devised his own method of getting those ideas across. Today, on the job . . . or in school, communication remains a vital part of our world. Which is exactly what we'll be talking about in the upcoming issue of "Insider" — the free supplement to your college newspaper from Ford.

We'll tell you how to improve your communication skills . . . from writing term papers and doing oral presentations, to communicating with friends, parents and persons of authority. And whether you're looking for an internship or a full-time job, we've got loads of info to help you get there. With tips on how to write a persuasive resume, handle an interview gracefully, use the telephone effectively, and much more.

Steady sales greet reopening

Sales were steady all day yesteday at the newly renovated Blue Wall on-campus bar.

Barbara Downey, a supervisor at the Bluewall, reported it was not packed, but sales were pretty good. The bar has been closed for renovations since last summer.

She said they did not know how sales would go, since the bar had been closed so long.

INDEX to arrive in March

The 1980 INDEX should be on campus the week following spring break, 1980 Editor-in Chief June Kokturk announced last week. Kokturk said typesetting delays contributed to the lateness of the publication, which is scheduled each year to arrive in the fall.

It was difficult to get enough time on the typesetter in the Student Senate Communications ofice, she said. Several student groups used the machine which frequently broke down. Finding student typesetters was also a problem in producing the 256-page book.

Edge of night.

You see the lights blazing up and down the Mountain almost as soon as you hit the highway. Like beacons, they beckon you to the slopes.

And when you reach the Mountain, you're in a broad tunnel of light. Top to bottom, it cuts through the edge of night, illuminating the slopes and trails. Down in the darkened valley, lights blink back at you as far as your eyes can see. But up here, you ski down the slopes as though it were high noon.

Later, when the mountain air builds up your appetite and thirst, you meet your friends for hearty food and drink at Tom's Tavern. What a way to end the day! High above the Connecticut River Valley, but it's as close as your own back yard . . .

Hoopwomen win three; face Springfield today

By KEVIN CULLEN
Collegian Staff

The plan is not very complicated. It's not unlike those Merrill Lynch commercials:

When head coach Mary Ann Ozdarski talks, the Univeristy of Massachusetts women's basketball team listens.

For the last three games, Ozdarski's been talking and her players have been listening, as UMass has racked up three successive wins against Connecticut (65-61), Providence (77-64) and Princeton (74-62).

Ozdarski's advice is fairly simple: keep the opposition under 70 points. UMass has done just that, improving their record to 12-7, winning four of their last five, seven of their last nine.

"We've got to keep teams under 70 if we want to win the rest of our games," Ozdarski says. "We certainly cannot afford any defensive lapses."

Ozdarski's advice is based on sound reasoning; in the nine games that UMass has allowed their opponents to score 70-or-more points, UMass has won just three.

UMass is shooting for one of the top four seeds in next month's Eastern regionals, which would ensure a home court advantage for UMass with the opening round taking place in the Cage.

UMass survived a case of poor foul shooting (33 percent, their worst this year) last Tuesday, to stave off a UConn club that got closer than they should have. UMass went to the foul line just twice—and missed both shots—in a first half during which they built a 34-29 lead. UMass continued its poor foul shooting in the second half, particularly in one-and-one situations, and only its domination of the boards (44 to UConn's 28) prevented them from losing to an inferior team. Julie Ready's 24 points paced UMass, while Wendy Ward controlled the ball and added 10 points. Freshman Cindy Clapp contributed a quiet eight points (4-for-4 from the floor) along with nine rebounds.

From there, it was back to the Cage last Thursday, where the women played only their sixth home game this year, hosting a Providence team they had beaten 71-60 in an earlier season encounter. UMass jumped out to a 46-23 halftime lead, which Providence whittled down to as little as nine points with five minutes to play. Again it was Ready's 29 points leading the way in the 77-64 win, as the senior hit on 12 of 17 shots from the floor and 5-for-5 from the line. UMass got nine points each from Ward, Clapp and super-sub Sherry Collins, while perhaps most significantly UMass controlled the boards, led by Ginger Legare's 14 rebounds.

Last Saturday, it was down to Princeton, where a series of distractions and a half-hour late start enabled a weaker host team to build a very surprising 40-27 halftime lead.

"We were distracted," Ozdarski explained. "A wrestling match before our game caused a late start, and we stood around for a half-hour waiting for the game to begin."

When it did, UMass proceeded to have their worst shooting half of the year, hitting just 11 of 30 (36 percent) from the floor and five of ten from the line. But it was nothing a few choice words from Ozdarski and assistant coach Steve Jefferson couldn't cure.

"We had a talk at halftime, and we turned it around," Ozdarski said. "We were not going to lose that game."

It was that simple. UMass came out and held Princeton to just 22 points in the second half, while scoring 47 of their own as their shooting picked up to the tune of 13-for-27 from the floor and a remarkable 21-for-24 from the line.

The Princeton game also marked the advent of a balanced scoring output which Ozdarski hopes to see more of. Ready led with 16 points, followed close behind by Legare's 14, Clapp's 13 and Collins' 11.

Ozdarski hopes to see such balance tonight when the team travels down Rte. 91 to take on Springfield College. Springfield, 11-3, is a solid basketball team led by guard Anita Thomas (19.2 points-per-game), the formidable Randi Zoia (14.3) at forward, and play-making guard Sharon Price who is averaging nearly seven assists per game.

Hoopmen drop three; winless at Provident Classic

By KEVIN CULLEN
Collegian Staff

BOSTON—Craig Smith's box, words and music by Lakeside, told the story:

"Come along and ride on this fantastic voyage..."

A voyage during which the University of Massachusetts basketball team played some of its best and some of its worst hoop this year; a voyage during which UMass lost three games, by 34, 25 and 29 points; a voyage during which UMass played even with one of the top 20 teams in the nation for 13 minutes, and a voyage that ended in the sub-freezing temperatures of the Whitmore parking lot, where a weary 3-15 team returned home after losing its sixth game in a row.

The journey began last Tuesday with a trip down to Storrs, where the Minutemen took on the newly-emerged powerhouse of Connecticut, at the time ranked 20th in the Associated Press poll. UMass played perhaps their best 13 minutes of basketball this season, matching UConn hoop for hoop and remarkably had the score tied 24-24. Problem was, the other 27 minutes weren't so hot. UConn ran off 15 straight points and four minutes later it was 39-24.

The Huskies never looked back. Behind 18-point performances by Mike McKay and Chuck Aleksinas, and nine points and as many rebounds from one Mr. Cornelius Thompson, UConn shot 66 percent from the floor and 69 percent from the line en route to a 98-64 win.

If the UConn game proved anything, it was that UMass freshmen Edwin Green and Craig Sith can play with anyone in Div. 1 basketball. Green had 24 points, two of them on a dunk over Aleksinas and Thompson which left the two potential All-Americans in their proverbial jocks. Smith, who has perhaps the best raw leaping ability of anyone his size (6-foot-4) at UMass since the Doctah, had 14 points and carried himself well defensively all night.

From the less than cozy confines of UConn's Field House it was up to Boston Garden, next stop on the journey being the Provident Classic, successor to the now-defunct Colonial Classic. UMass performances on Friday and Saturday nights kept in tradition, but were far from classic as the Minutemen opened with a listless 75-50 loss to Holy Cross, followed by an equally listless 91-62 beating at the hands of Boston University.

Both games served as a pictorial example of what happens when your front line plays against an opposing front line averaging three to five inches taller than you.

You get beat.

For two successive nights, disappointing crowds (the final drew only 7,000) watched the familiar sight: a taller opponent grabbing a rebound—offensive, defensive, you name it—away from a UMass player, usually without fouling.

"It's been the same story all year," lamented UMass head coach Ray Wilson. "Our big problem is that we're taking early shots and getting caught in the transition game. Every time I look up we miss a shot or turn the ball over and—bang—here comes a three-on-one break with (UMass guard) Ronnie Washington or someone else back there all alone."

In the Holy Cross game UMass got over half of their points from Green (16) and Smith (13); throw in Tyrone Whitehead's eight, and the three freshmen combined for nearly 90 percent of their team's scoring. Not exactly the balance you strive for.

The BU game was a repeat of a repeat of a repeat. Wilson started four freshmen (Green, Smith, Whitehead and guard Bill Bayno) along with a sophomore (Washington) and UMass hung tough and actually held a four-point lead at three junctures early in the game before a series of turnovers gave the sleeping Terriers the opportunity to come out of the sluggishness caused by a close loss to Classic winner Boston College the night before. Green ended up with 21 points, 10 rebounds, while Smith tossed in 17 points.

If you're one who believes things can only get better for UMass basketball, consider this: It was learned yesterday that the team's second leading scorer, Dan Wright, was placed on academic probation and is no longer with the team.

Fantastic.

150,000 DEMAND HOLIDAY

Miriam Osborne Herr

by CURTIS HAYNES NUMMO STAFF

"Gov Gobs of Black Folks" is how comedian/activist Dick Gregory described the crowd of between 100,000 and 200,000 demonstrators who rallied in Washington on January 15, in support of making Martin Luther King Jr.'s birthday a national holiday.

The rally began with a march starting at the U.S. Department of Agriculture grounds and ending at the Washington Monument. Upon arrival at the monument Congressman Walter Fauntroy, the master of ceremonies, led the predominantly black crowd with the chant "Martin Luther King day, we want a holiday; Martin Luther King day, we want a holiday."

Martin Luther King daughter Bernice addressed the largest black rights demonstration since 1963 were Jesse Jackson, the civil rights activist, Dick Gregory, Marion Barry Washington's mayor, Martin Luther King III the son of the great leader, William Tate the chief defendent of the Wilmington 10 trial, now a leader of the National Independent Political Party, Ben Chavis of the National United Auto Workers and Dizzy Gillispe.

The final speaker of the day, and the master mind of the rally, was Stevie Wonder. While being introduced to the podium Stevie was greeted by a huge ovation, as large portraits of Martin Luther King, and Black Nationalist red black and green flags, and thousands of fists waved jubilently in the air. When Stevie Wonder began to speak the roaring crowd quieted down to almost complete silence as Stevie's voice,(which was being carried over an inadequate sound system)as he described Martin Luther King Jr. "a man among men", who "lived and died with American ideas of freedom and justice. At the end of his speech "Stevie Wonder Come" and "Happy Birthday" (a song dedicated to Martin Luther King, in Stevie Wonder's latest album "Hotter Than July") the crowd stopped, and headed home, many people with tears in their eyes and the words "Happy Birthday"on their lips.

The message was loud and clear in Washington, and across the nationlthousands of people participated in rallys of his sort all across America.Black America stood for peace and love for all people.

However, there is more to the fact that thousands of blacks marched on Wahington, in honor of a great man. The march was probably the largest show of unity between blacks that this nation has ever seen. Even though all that was asked was a holiday!

a couple of speakers addressed more serious problems the main focus was the passing of congressional legislation for making Martin Luther Kings 1965, there were almost no Black elected officials in this state. Today there are several Black majors, many Black members of City and county councils, and several Black school board members around the state. In some areas like Dillon and Florence Representatives are Black. One half of the Charleston City Council is Black.

DID THE ACT GIVE US FREEDOM•

No. We are still a Captive People. The major decisions in South Carolina are still made by a small group of white rulers. Black People are still kept on the bottom.

But Black voters have been able to win some seats in South Carolina. We have forced the politicians to open up more jobs for Black People. We have forced the politicians to get better health care and better education in the Black Communities. All this was possible because of the VOTING RIGHTS ACT.

DO WE STILL NEED THE ACT•

Yes, we do.

If the VOTING RIGHTS ACT is killed, Black People will lose many of the gains we have won in South Carolina. The VOTING RIGHTS ACT was one step in our road to liberation. We must move forward. We can't let our enemies push us back.

1981 HOUSE NIGGER

By John Bonner
BNS Contributing Editor

(Updated from the original, "The 1975 House Nigger")

In order for us to become a complete and united race we must, from time to time, measure the economic, spiritual and mental growth of our people as a whole. To do this, we must look back into our past and see who we were, where we were, and why we were... Then we must look at ourselves in the present day and determine the economic progress and mental growth, if any, that has been realized by us as a whole and not just by a small percentage of us.

We must always deal with ourselves from a truthful and factual foundation. Therefore, we must weigh our strengths against our weaknesses and be able to objectively criticize those weaknesses. We must be determined to eradicate those weaknesses and to strengthen our qualities.

Looking into our post-slavery days, we find that the major weakness of Black people was the ability of other races to manipulate and control our minds. Once our minds had been overtaken, our physical bodies became enslaved in chains. We then had become a race of mindless people existing only for the will of someone else.

Being of no mind, we began to search for only a piece of mind and some form of identity. The enslavers stood ready and gave us the Negro mind while we pressed the search for an identity. And the only identity we saw back then was the identity of the slavemaster. Thus was formed the antebellus 'house nigger mentality' and the house nigger mentality of the 1980's as well.

Yes, speaking from the foundation of truth, we still find some of our people enslaved in their minds. Even though more than a century has passed since chains were taken from our arms, necks and feet, some of us failed to realize that the chains which enclosed our minds had to be removed also, and those who failed to realize this are evident in their existence today.

They are the ones who never broke the mental bondage. They are the Black people of today who refuse to think and do for themselves.

They do not have anything of their own. They only have what the 1981 slavemaster will let them look after, or rent.

They will be dressed in their slavemaster's clothes or drive their slavemaster's big cars.

Some will straighten their hair as their master does, in order to look like him.

These were the characteristics of our ancestors who were house niggers 200 years ago maybe because they had no choice except death and these are the characteristics of many Black people in 1981, simply because they don't want to be themselves.

We all know the situation that Black people face. We all know that we are not united. We all know that we look to the white man for everything and to ourselves for nothing. We all know it exists, but do we all know why?

It is time now for answers, solutions, and positive action. No more questions, excuses, and states of mindlessness. Now is the time to have control of all facets of our minds, to see who we really are and what we are capable of being.

The house nigger mentality is no longer necessary for us to survive. As a matter of fact, it places our survival in serious jeopardy.

There is a new criteria for the survival of all oppressed people, but if new standards are to be used, we must relinquish the old ones, for they are outdated as slavery and colonialism. These new criteria being:

1) to do for ourselves

2) to be ourselves

3) to set and recognize our own values

4) to govern, expand, and execute the thoughts of our own minds

5) to solidify and magnify the concept of nationhood, and

6) to unite our minds for growth and progress.

Only after we engage in the new criteria for survival will we be able to survive the forces of racism and house niggerism of the 1980's.

The 1781 house niggers are dead, but the 1981 house nigger still resides in the minds of some of our people. It is this living mentality, and this mentality alone, that keeps Black people begging for handouts; in the unemployment lines, begging their old slavemasters for food; in the old slavemaster's clothing stores, begging to wear some of his cheap clownish rags; which he shouldn't be caught dead in.

We are still asking the old slavemaster to give us an identity and a mind, so we go to the slavemaster's schools and receive his concept of education. We smoke and shoot the white man's dope, asking that dope to give us a mind, to expand that mind, to make us think on a higher level. If you have to use dope to reach a higher plan, then your mind, if one is left, is falling short of its natural duties.

We no longer need these superficial trinkets to survive. All we need is the ability to think for ourselves, and reach into ourselves for what was given to us by our Creator.

Black people, come away from the house nigger mentality, to the universal mentality of man. Let us not dwell in the house of the old and new slavemasters, forever!

STOP CHILDREN'S MURDER: CAMILLE BELL SPEAKS

SUBMITTED BY THIRD WORLD WOMANS TASK FORCE

The following is an excerpt from a speech made on January 20, 1981 in Washington, D.C. by Camille Ward Bell of the Committee to STOP Children's Murder. Mrs. Bell was one of many speakers at the National Teach-In sponsored by the John Brown Anti-Klan Committee.

"I am Camille Bell from Atlanta, Georgia. I am the mother of Yusef Bell who was found strangled to death in a school — an an abandoned school — in Atlanta, in late '79. He was nine years old. I am also the chairperson of the parent support group: The Committee to STOP Children's Murder.

"When I first came here, I'd planned to come and basically tell you about . . . Atlanta, with no editorial comments, and sit down. But I didn't feel I could do that and. . . know that I was not telling you the whole true story of my home. Now, some of you are not going to like what I have to say but that's all right; I didn't come here to win a popularity contest.

"In Atlanta we are dealing with a very serious problem: somebody is killing our children. In this room are probably some of the finest minds in this country; and you're occupied with stopping the Klan. And, that's probably a commendable effort on your part but someone is killing our children and we don't have time to play trivial games with the middle rodgers. . . If we do, in this country, have a group of people who are responsible for the death of our children and other Blacks throughout the country, it is most likely not the Klan as we know it. The people responsible do not run around in white sheets. They sit on the boards of major corporations, and in political offices, and are pulling strings of a puppet people who happen so be those Klansmen out there who do wear white sheets.

"Anybody who feels like he has nothing going for him except the pigment in his skin or lack of same is more to be pitied than censored. Now, you need to be about a serious effort to reeducate those people. After all they have the right to know that they are — even if they're poor and ignorant — that they are 'somebody.' And they don't need me as a measuring stick to prove it. Now, I'm not as ignorant as I was yesterday and I'm not as wise as I'm gonna be tomorrow, but I am somebody. And I don't feel that it matters what racial or social organization our murderers belong to or what pseudo-political philosophy they espouse. They need to be discovered, exposed, and prosecuted.

"But, if one guiltless person has to suffer death or injury in an anarchaic attempt at vengence, then we are wrong. People cannot meet violence with violence. We can't meet hatred with hatred. If we do this are we any less ignorant than the puppets of the righteous, racist right — or the amoral minority that's running the country now?

"In Atlanta, fourteen children are dead and three are missing. These children were stolen from the streets of their neighborhood in broad daylight, then thrown back on our streets like trash. No child who has ever been stolen has been found alive. . . No group has claimed credit for these ghastly acts.

"What's happening in Atlanta is not happening in a vacuum. What's happening in Atlanta is happening with the sanction of the people who control our country. And the only way that I know to stop them on a level that we can deal with will be to stop them by undermining their power base. Their power base happens to be poor and middle class people who are very politically unaware, in this country. And the people that have to do it are the people who are politically aware.

1965 VOTING RIGHTS ACT

United States senator Strom Thurmond says he is going to try to kill the 1965 VOTING RIGHTS ACT this year. Thurmond is the new chairman of the powerful Senate Judiciary Commitee. He has been against the VOTING RIGHTS ACT since it was first passed. Thurmond has many friends in the country who will help him try to kill the VOTING RIGHTS ACT.

WHAT IS THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT?

The VOTING RIGHTS ACT is a law that was passed in 1965 to protect the rights of Black voters in the Southern states. The VOTING RIGHTS ACT has two main parts.

The first part of the VOTING RIGHTS ACT makes it illegal to discriminate against Black People who want to register or vote. It also makes it illegal to threaten or intimidate voters to make them vote a certain way. This part of the VOTING RIGHTS ACT applies to every part of the United States.

The second part of the VOTING RIGHTS ACT only applies to the South. Any time that any Southern state wants to change any election law, it must first check with the U.S. Justice Department. It must prove that the new law will not discriminate

FEDERAL STUDY BRAGS: NYC HAVEN FOR RICH

REPRINTED FROM WORKERS WORLD

By Andy Stapp

NEW YORK, Jan. 19 According to the deputy director of New York City's Office of Management and Budget (OMB), this city, the largest metropolis in the U.S., is doing so well "it's almost frightening." Displaying economic figures released on Jan 11 by the Federal Bureau of Labor Statistics, OMB spokesman Charles Budenbender painted a warm and glowing picture of the healthy and happy life enjoyed by residents of the Big Apple.

The New York Times was certainly impressed by what the statistics revealed. On Jan. 12 this newspaper began a front page story by boasting that "From Madison Avenue retail stores to Broadway Theaters to Wall Street firms, a broad band of New York City businesses prospered during the 1980's recession. Wall Street stockbrokers had their best year," raking in billions. The Times added that "the demand for office space, shops, and apartments remained strong despite rapidly rising rents."

Life Not Rosy for Jobless

Though it is true, the Times continued, that "the city lost more than 300,000 jobs and nearly a million people in a shakeout of marginal and ailing industries" over the past few years, the banks are in pig heaven. "While Chrysler is laying off workers in Detroit, the automaker's banks in New York are hiring extra people to audit the company's loans."

Wonderful.

The paper does concede that there are a few flies in the ointment, facts like the on going decline of purchasing power of factory workers and that the city will "need something over 400,000 jobs" just to bring unemployment down to the national level, that is to the level today suffered by workers nationally in the worst economic downturn since the monster depression of the 1930s!

No need to worry about a few hundred thousand "marginal" workers in "ailing" blue collar industries, this big business newspaper concludes, ending on an optimistic note by quoting one of their favorite moneymen: "Do you think the recession has affected New York City?" asked Lewis Cole, a partner in the law firm of Stroock Stroock Lavan. 'People complain bitterly about all sorts of things, but they are making money like they never thought they'd make it. Banks security firms, lawfirms.'"

Banks, security firms, law firms; it's sort of like a holy trinity. And if the trinity feels good, everyone else should shut up, stop complaining, and get with the program. After all, what's to complain about when the mayor comes up with a holiday surprise of 1,000 cops complete with doggy companions (who bite) and Wall Street is so satisfied with their gargantuan profits and the municipal government's budget balancing tamed at making sure that the banks continue to rake in big bucks on those tax-exempt municipal loans the city is awarded with a better "credit rating"?

The seven million New Yorkers should be sporting seven million smiling faces, gratified that no matter what else goes wrong, there are rich people in their midst who can still afford to spend $7 million on one painting, who feel more comfortable with the idea of New York evicting all those poor and working people and in their place transforming Manhattan (the other boroughs are "marginal") into a haven for bosses, technocrats, tourists, and administrators.

Unfortunately, the dream of the super rich that people stop complaining is not coming true. In fact people here are angrier than ever; one symptom of this anger being the 400,000 phone calls that have poured into the city's Central Complaint Bureau, protests against landlords who give no heat or hot water even when the temperature drops below zero.

Who was responsible for hostage crisis?

By Andy Stapp

JANUARY 20—Now that the hostages from Iran are on their way home, it is important to remember how this crisis began in the first place, how it was instigated and dragged out from beginning to end by the U.S. government, the bankers, and the oil companies.

And how the pivotal event which led almost immediately to the hostage seizure was the entry of the shah into the U.S., Carter's open arms welcome for one of the world's most despised and hated tyrants.

Progressive people in the U.S. know that it is good that the hostages are out, for their exit from Iran will eventually create an atmosphere clearing away a great deal of the chauvinist fog generated by the capitalist news media that made it hard for many to actually see what had really happened, who was the oppressor and who the oppressed, which party had suffered terrible injuries, and who had committed real aggression against whom.

U.S. CIA installed shah

No one, not even the imperialist news media, would disagree that the shah had been put in power and kept in power for more than a quarter of a century by the U.S. CIA. The 1953 coup that firmly established the shah on the throne has been admitted to even by agency officials, unable to conceal their delight at achieving such a big success.

Once in power, the shah became the Hitler of Iran. Tutored by CIA and Pentagon specialists, his SAVAK secret police and repressive military forces killed scores of thousands of Iranians. When the revolution finally toppled the Pahlavi monarchy, more than 100,00 political prisoners were discovered still alive inside various prisons. Almost all of them had been physically tortured.

No one denies any of this. Why was the shah, wanted for mass murder in Iran, allowed to come to the U.S.?

Rockefeller's role

The New York Times of Nov. 17, 1979 admitted that "intense lobbying by David Rockefeller, the shah's banker" is what persuaded the Carter administration to let him in. This is the same David Rockefeller whose Chase Manhattan Bank benefitted so much by the seizure of billions of dollars in Iranian assets.

CBS News reported tonight that the banks even brought about a last minute delay in the hostage release by trying to add a self-serving "appendix" to the agreement negotiated between the two countries!

A lot more of the picture will emerge as events unfold, but one thing is sure. Neither Carter (who manipulated the hostages for election purposes), nor Rockefeller (who first helped provoke, then gained financially from the crisis) nor Reagan (who has praised the shah as he has lauded every other right-wing client dictatorship) nor the oil company bosses (who are only interested in exploiting Iran's vast petroleum supplies); none of them sympathize with any cause or person unless it will benefit themselves.

The return of the embassy staff does not mean that U.S. imperialism will not continue to menace and try to subvert the Iranian Revolution. It does, however, enable the revolutionaries in Iran to concentrate their attention on vital class struggle issues, just as it will end a situation which the ruling class has been using here in the U.S. to inhibit the struggle against racism and militarism. Nor can the hostage issue be manipulated much longer by the media barons to divert people here away from the fight for more jobs, an end to rising prices, and the many other acute domestic social problems.

The forgotten hostages

By Bill Del Vecchio

JANUARY 21—For 444 days, the people of the U.S. were reminded of the physical and emotional suffering that imprisonment causes its victims and their families. The TV cameras were rolling to capture almost every glimpse of the 52 hostages and every tear shed by their loved ones.

But for a much larger group of hostages, there are no TV cameras present to bring word of their mistreatment to the people, or to show the sorrow of their families, or their joy of reunion when they are released.

These hostages are the approximately 314,000 people serving time in the prisons of the U.S. Thanks to a court system whose most important judgments are based on how much the accused can spend on a lawyer, the vast majority of these inmates are poor, and a disproportionate number of them come from the oppressed Black, Latin, Asian, and Native communities.

Crimes in the suites

While corporate executives who steal thousands of dollars in white collar crimes regularly breeze through the court system with suspended sentences or acquittals, poor people are sent to jail by the thousands for crimes of survival.

After brutalizing these people by the conditions inside the U.S. prisons, they are turned back out onto the same streets and left to cope with the same lack of jobs, the same poverty, the same racism, and no there should be little wonder why so many inmates become "repeat offenders."

While the 52 can look forward to a new life of freedom, 314,000 are faced with dehumanizing conditions of prison life for the present and bleak prospects for the future. They continue to be held hostage by an unjust penal system which victimizes the poor and protects the rich.

FOUR OF the men most responsible for the Iran crisis (left to right) The shah, who was put in power by the CIA, who stole billions of dollars of his country's wealth and murdered many thousands of people. By welcoming him to the U.S., Carter touched off the hostage seizure. David Rockefeller and his close confidant Henry Kissinger. These two used all their influence in Washington to get the shah an entry into this country. Super banker Rockefeller master-minded the seizure of Iran's assets, a move which greatly prolonged the crisis. General Alexander Haig, who as NATO commander sent a high-level military delegation to Iran just before the shah's overthrow in an attempt to stiffen Iranian military resistance against the growing insurrection. Rockefeller and Kissinger have recently toured U.S. client states in South America, Africa, and the Middle East on behalf of the Reagan administration and ultra-militarist Haig has become Reagan's Secretary of State.

PUERTO RICO: U.S. MILITARY INSTALLATION ATTACKED

On January 12, 1981 a clandestine organization which favors the independence of Puerto Rico claimed responsibility for what is today considered as "the most devastating attack on a U.S. military installation on U.S. soil." The attack caused the destruction of nine (9) fighters jets of the Puerto Rican National Guards. Two other jets, a station wagon and a small truck were also seriously damaged by bombs placed

NEWS BRIEFS

SET BACK FOR U.S. DEFENSE STRATEGY

The South African military is now faced with an embarrassing fait accompli: the imminent withdrawal of the first Cuban troops from Angola, the ending of which is especially awkward since it coincides with a drive to encourage investment by businessmen. Lieutenant-General Magnus Malan, eight ill-considered months in office, has just announced his decision to quit the force in December, citing disillusionment. Malan previously opposed withdrawal of Cuban troops from Angola, and personal hostility between the two commanders played a part in his resignation. Malan's colleagues fought hard, says the Guardian (U.K.) that he was right on remaining more active in the war — repeatedly asked if there was any communication between Pretoria and the Cuban command, Malan would reply that there was not. Now, however, it seems that Malan was wrong. Pretoria has been in contact with Cuban officials for some time, and has been told that the withdrawal will be completed by the end of August. Malan's departure is a serious blow to the South African military establishment, which has been counting on his leadership to push through its plans for a massive increase in defense spending. Malan's resignation is also a blow to the government's hopes of attracting foreign investment. Malan was the most outspoken of the military leaders in his opposition to the Cuban withdrawal, and his departure is a clear sign that the military has lost the battle to keep the Cubans in Angola.

base was carried out on the 182nd anniversary of the birth of Eugenio Maria de Hostos, Puertorrican patriot who fought against Spain for independence of the island.

In a communique that the Macheteros sent to a TV station in San Juan they explained or justified their attack. They mentioned that the political atmosphere existing on the island was one of the reasons for the terrorist attack. In order to understand this point it is important to know the political status of Puerto Rico. At this moment Puerto Rico is considered a commonwealth of the United States. The island is not an independent country nor is it a stateof the United States. Puerto Ricans are American citizens but they cannot vote for the President and the Congress of the U.S., nor receive all the benefits that the American citizenship is suppose to guarantee them. These conditions among others help to keep the political issue in diaucssion the next four years after the elections. In fact Puerto Ricans have been seeking political independence for more than 250 years. According to these groups the United states is the side that has the power to terminate this condition of political limbo. They do not accept the self determination chorale of the United States each time that the United Nations calls for the decoloni ation of the island.

Another reason the Macheteros gave for their attack was the Viequenses struggels agains the U..S Navy. Vieques is an island off the eastern coast of Puerto Rico. Most of the inhabitants of the island are fishermen. This island is used by the Navy for its gunfire exercise, The damage that the bombs inflict upon the environment of the island cause the Viequenses muchsuffering. They live in the middle of the island. At one side they have the practice fields (where live bombs can be found) and at the other they have huge underground ammunitions depots. These conditions do not allow the Viequenses to move in their own land. When the Navy decides to have training exercises the fishermen are not allowed to go out in the waters.

There are other reasons contained in the communique that are related to the first two (according to the Macheteros). But the central point that the macheteros wanted to make clear in their communique is that the United States' relation with Puerto Rico is one where only one party has voice, and that condition must be ended.

Last week Gen.,28) Secretary of State Alexander M. Haig had his first conference. He mentioned among other things, how the Reagan Administration will react to terrorism. It was clear that Mr. Haig was sending a message to the Soviet Union. He accused the Soviet Union of promoting terrorism around the world and tried to show some muscles to demonstrate that the Administration would work these problems in a different way. So, we can assist here the administration would end that terrorism that does not involve other governments (rhetoric terrorism). He answered that this kind of terrorism is much more difficult to stop.

The terrorist attack in the Puerto Rican National Guard base was that kind of terrorism. The attack was done by a group that does not claim affiliation with any political organization in other countries. For this attack the Reagan Administration cannot blame the Russians. The FBI and other intelligence agencies in the U.S. already know the terrorists were PuertorRican.

birthday a holiday)the message is clear that whether legislation is passed or not , Martin Luther King's birthday has become a major symbol of unity. It is apparent that this message was not meant for the nation because of the obvious weakened, inadequate, and false news coverage of the march. (television news reports showed brief glimpsese of a huge crowd and told the public that it was between 15,000 and 50,000 depending on the station. National newspapesis had brief articles written and lost somewhere between the comics and the sports).However, the propaganda of black americans the message is still there, and the longer the government puts off declaring January 15th holiday the more militant blacks will become, which, and if the government declares January 15 a holiday that they will become a major organizational force point o the black peoples struggle.

Some have never exposed or have in the first place, and are just waiting for the moment to strike back to the police or practically, by that manner. On the other hand, the negative possibilities for that type of action seem to be overshadowed by the drop in student enrollment accounted at this year among institutions of higher learning during this decade. With the end of the post-World baby boom, the university is going to have to(according to the Macheteros). But the central point that the macheteros wanted to make clear in their communique is that the United States' relation with Puerto Rico is one where only one party has voice, and that condition must be ended.

against Black voters. This second part of the VOTING RIGHTS ACT is called " Section 5".

"Section 5" is the most important part of the VOTING RIGHTS ACT. Every year, the Southern states pass marny laws to try to descrimnate against Black voters. If those states did not have to check with the U.S. Justice Department, Black People would not stand a chance of stopping these laws from getting passed.

WHY THE SECTION 5 JUST IN THE SOUTH*

The VOTING RIGHTS ACT was passed to stop the Southern states from discriminating against Black voters.

From the 1880's until the 1960's, Southern states used every trick to keep Black People from getting political power. Every Southern state had laws to stop Black People from registering or voting, in some cases, Black People were killed from their votes or threats out of their homes if they tried to register or vote. In some areas, Black People were beaten or killed if they tried to vote.

[illegible] Black People were too afraid to try to register or vote. And because no one was heard, most Black People figured it just wasn't any use trying.

[illegible] THE SOUTH STOP ALL BLACK VOTING*

No. The Southern states did not try to give up that.

People from voting before 1965. They just started to keep Black People from gaining political power. Before 1965, the Southern states would list a few Black People registered and vote in each county. The number of Black voters was kept low so that Black People could not get too much power. It was mostly the educated Black People or the ones who had businesses or good jobs who were allowed to register.

HOW WAS THE ACT PASSED*

Congress passed the VOTING RIGHTS ACT because of great pressure from Black People in this country. Most of the pressure came from Black People in the South. During the 1960's, thousands of Black People in the South marched and demonstrated for the right to vote. Many lawsuits were filled to stop them from voting. Many Black soldiers refused to fight for the U.S. in Vietnam when they did not have the right to vote in their own home towns. Black People were organizing everywhere, and we were demanding our voting rights.

Congress was afraid that they would lose control of Black People if they did not give us our voting rights.

HOW DID THE ACT HELP BLACK PEOPLE*

The VOTING RIGHTS ACT has helped Black People in South Carolina in two ways.

First, the VOTING RIGHTS ACT made it possible for more Black People to vote. In 1964, before the VOTING RIGHTS ACT was passed, there were only 16,000 Black registered voters in South Carolina. But in 1981, there were 520,000 Black registered voters in the state.

Second, the VOTING RIGHTS ACT made it possible for Black People to get elected to political office in South Carolina. Before [illegible] The quality of this American Studies department and programs, as other campuses, have proved over the years their justice and attention to those of the Indian [illegible]people.

[illegible] That is a difficult question, especially since I have not travelled about to other areas to check on the status of Black Studies throughout the country. But it is useful, first of all, to emphasize some of the actual [illegible] and programs. Black programs, courses, centers, and curricula. There are, for example, relatively thriving [illegible] departments at Ohio State, [illegible], SUNY Albany, and numerous others, plus graduate and undergraduate degrees in Afro-American Studies. In Ohio State, for example, the administration is very there is a small core of people with full time appointments in Afro-American studies, while the bulk of the programs [illegible] teaching and appointments with other departments. It is an open question, and appointments of faculty and student majors of students are the rule in institutions such as Harvard and Yale. There are also important centers, which [illegible] undergraduate work, in major in the [illegible] of Michigan, Detroit, and UCLA.

Some other graduate degrees, and some on and. One should also mention the work of southern Black colleges, which, [illegible] of them have no need of Black Studies programs per se [illegible] for fundraising [illegible] and of such programs [illegible] and even the coming months, with the event of being able to provide you with a much more intelligent comparison for them. But the important point is that Black Studies is alive and well throughout the country, despite the fears of a number of [illegible]. [illegible] what we're going to be here, you know. We've been working on our plans for the decade since last year, and very shortly I'll be in a position to tell you more about that. Era ends with Trustee meeting today

Trustees to hear report from labor committee

By DEBORAH ASSLAND
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees today will hear a report from its labor relations committee on the recently signed union faculty and librarian contracts.

This afternoon's meeting is the Trustees' last scheduled meeting before the Board of Regents takes over the reigns of the state's higher education system on March 1. It is thought that if the Trustees do not ratify the contract at today's meeting an additional session will be held to vote on the new contract.

Sources from the faculty and administration agree they would like to see the new contract ratified before the end of the month.

The Massachusetts Society of Professors, the union representing both faculty and librarians, has set February 11 and 12 as the dates for its members to vote on the ratification of the new contract. Both votes must ratify the new pact before it can be implemented.

When the state's reorganization plan takes effect on March 1, a new Board of Trustees will replace the existing 24-member board.

The board is scheduled to meet at 1:30 p.m. today at the Park Plaza complex in Boston. A reception will follow the meeting.

The board will also discuss the naming of the University library on the Boston campus, faculty sabbatical leaves, appointments to committee studies, and the final list of February graduates from all campuses.

Board of Trustees relinquishes power after 118 years

The University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees, which has been associated with the name of UMass-Amherst since 1863, will hold its last regularly scheduled meeting today in Boston before relinquishing its power to the newly-created Board of Regents on March 1.

The regents will assume control of all 16 institutions of higher education in the state as part of a plan to reorganize and centralize Massachusetts higher education.

A new UMass Board of Trustees, which will make recommendations for the regents and oversee some aspects of the three-campus UMass system, is expected to be named by Gov. Edward J. King later this month. The new trustee board will include student representatives from the Boston and Amherst campuses, as does the current board.

According to Carol Cohen, from the UMass president's office, the trustee board has undergone various changes since it was established in the mid-1800's to govern what was then the Massachusetts Agricultural College. By 1965, the 24 member board was responsible for UMass-Amherst, the UMass Medical School in Worcester and UMass-Boston.

Cohen said student representatives were included as voting members on the board during the early 1970's. Students across the state are currently working for similar representation on the Board of Regents.

Trustees were appointed by the governor for a seven year term. For the last 10 years, the current board has been chaired by Joseph D. Sheehy, president of the Middlesex Bank.

The drop out of the current board is "very sad for everyone," said Cohen. "They did an admirable job for the University."

Committee searching to fill Chancellor post

A committee searching to fill the newly-created position of Chancellor of Higher Education in Massachusetts interviewed the first of four final candidates this week and committee members say they hope to put their final recommendations before the Board of Regents at the board's first meeting in March.

The Regents will assume control of the state's 24 public higher education institutions on March 1. The chancellor will oversee the 41 staff members for the board and will be responsible for all administrative work for the regents.

The search committee, composed of four regents, one student representative, one community president and one faculty representative, has been searching a chancellor since mid-December. Paul Parisi, former secretary to Gov. Edward J. King, has served as acting-chancellor while the search is in progress.

The committee started off with 34 applications, and has narrowed the list of candidates to about four, according to trustee Ronald Kiely, who is the student representative on the committee. The final four candidates, and possibly one or two others, will be interviewed over the next two weeks.

Janet Slavin, of the regent's staff, said the committee will make two or three recommendations to the full Board of Regents, who have final say over the selection. The new chancellor will be expected to begin work as soon as possible, she said.

The position was advertised in major newspapers throughout the country and in the Chronicle of Higher Education but the approximately 50 applications the committee received is considered low for a national search.

The low turnout has been attributed to the official salary of $50,000 a year, far below salaries offered for comparable positions in other states. In January, King filed legislation which would raise the salary to around $55,000 to $60,000 a year.

Also, according to published reports, Massachusetts is 48th in the country for state funding of higher public education. Some university officials speculate this is another reason for the low application turnout.

The search committee is headed by Regent Charles Sanders, director of the Massachusetts General Hospital. The Regents on the committee are Elizabeth Bellas, vice-dean of Simmons College; George Hazzard, president of the Worcester Polytechnical Institute; David Parmlee, president of Unimax Fruit and Foster Parmlee.

The interviews are being held in the board room of the State Attorney General's office in Boston.

World and national news

Industrialist warns of revolution in South Africa

By JAMES R. PEIPERT
Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa - Industrialist Harry Oppenheimer, chairman of the giant Anglo American Corp., has warned of possible revolution in South Africa in five years unless blacks get major concessions.

Oppenheimer's remarks, delivered in the 72 year-old industrialist's typical low-key style at a luncheon with foreign journalists on Monday, were in line with a long-held political philosophy he terms "radical conservatism."

But with a national election scheduled for April 29, Oppenheimer's warning was considered the clearest so far to Prime Minister P.W. Botha that the new five-year mandate he seeks could be the most important in South African history.

As chairman of Anglo American, Oppenheimer's remarks carry some weight.

The South African-based multinational corporation produces some 40 percent of the country's gold, about a third of its coal and a like amount of its uranium.

Oppenheimer told the journalists that Botha and previous National party governments, following the official policy of apartheid or racial segregation, have squandered too much time in trying to reach an accommodation between South Africa's 4.5 million whites and 20 million blacks.

He said that during his two years as prime minister, Botha had raised the hopes of blacks with promises of a new deal, at the same time telling whites they must "adapt or die."

Oppenheimer said time is running out and unless "substantive changes" are made by the mid 1980s, South Africa could face violent revolution.

Polish government affirms opposition to union

WARSAW, Poland (AP) — Poland's Communist Party leader, in his strongest denunciation of the independent trade union movement, accused Solidarity yesterday of seeking to become a "political opposition party" and of spreading anarchy.

Stanislaw Kania affirmed the government's opposition to a union of private farmers and said Poland was faced with "manifestations of anarchy" and with transformation of Solidarity into an organization "far removed from what is laid down in its statutes."

Kania's speech, made public yesterday, was given Saturday to a closed-door meeting of a committee preparing for next month's party congress and excerpts were broadcast by Polish state radio yesterday.

It came at a time of new charges from the Soviet Union and its allies that independent labor leaders were hostile to Communist Party rule and exploiting the crisis for their political ends. The Soviet government newspaper Izvestia charged yesterday that the Voice of America and Radio Free Europe were broadcasting "coded instructions" to anti-socialist forces in Poland.

Meanwhile, Solidarity leader Lech Walesa went to the southern town of Rzeszow to join talks between government negotiators and workers to end a general strike that was in its eighth day.

Kania, who took over leadership of Poland's beleaguered Communist Party and agreed to formation of the first independent labor unions in the Soviet bloc, said the government "cannot ignore, let alone accept" that "Solidarity is being steered in the direction of a political opposition party playing with the workers' trust."

He said that while the government recognized a right to strike, it "is a weapon of last resort ... many of our strikes are clearly political in character."

House committee examines ways to cut spending

By CLIFF HAAS
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Members of the House Budget Committee began examining specific ways to chop federal spending yesterday as a Reagan administration list proposing major cuts in social programs circulated through Congress.

Even as government officials were talking about budget trimming, the House Ways and Means Committee voted to raise the national debt limit to finance the current budget deficit, estimated to top $55 billion in 1981.

At the same time, big city mayors and black congressional leaders visited President Reagan in hopes of protecting urban and social aid programs from sharp reductions. However, the mayors said later that Reagan told them his drive to prune federal spending will mean deep cuts in urban aid and major changes in a program that provides funds to areas hit by recession.

In urging the increase in the debt limit, Treasury Secretary Donald T. Regan and Budget Director David A. Stockman told the Ways and Means Committee that government debt is expected to reach the current limit of $935.1 billion within a few days. The panel agreed to raise the ceiling $50 billion.

Stockman called the request "unappetizing" but necessary, noting that failure to raise the limit would mean the government would lose its borrowing authority.

As the House Budget Committee began examining ways to slice the budget, the chairman of the panel, Rep. James R. Jones, D-Okla., told his colleagues, "We begin what may well turn out to be the most painful political process through which any of us will ever go."

Facing the committee were 105 suggestions from congressional economists on how to cut billions of dollars from the budget and increase revenues.

"We leave behind the easy talk and get down in the trenches with 105 specific items, every one of which will do some damage to some people somewhere," Jones said.

Meanwhile, details of some of the administration's own tentative proposals for slashing billions of dollars from federal programs surfaced yesterday.

The targets for possible trimming included Social Security, import related unemployment benefits, extended jobless benefits, Medicaid, food stamps, public service jobs, farm-related loans and energy development subsidies.

The proposed "hit list" was drafted by budget director Stockman for consideration by Republican leaders in Congress, which must ultimately approve any budget changes.

Digest

Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger, appearing at a press conference yesterday, told reporters he is considering recommending deployment of the controversial nuetron warhead shelved by the Carter administration. A decision to order production of the warhead, designed to offset Soviet advantage in tank strength, would have to be made by President Reagan.

Israeli Cabinet Minister pleads innocent to bribery charges

JERUSALEM (AP) — Religious Affairs Minister Aharon Abu Hatzeira pleaded innocent to bribery charges yesterday at the opening of a trial that could become a political campaign issue in Israel's June election.

It was the first time in Israel's 32-year history that a Cabinet minister had gone on trial. Coming at the outset of what promises to be a bitterly fought election campaign, the trial could further damage Prime Minister Menachem Begin's coalition government.

Abu Hatzeira belongs to the National Religious Party, a small but powerful party that has been the key partner in almost every coalition government to rule Israel. It is likely to continue to play that role after the election but there is no telling how seriously the Abu Hatzeira trial may weaken the party's electoral appeal.

Outside the Jerusalem District Court building, Abu Hatzeira's supporters, many from the Moroccan Jewish community in which he is a leading figure, demonstrated noisily, chanting his name.

Labor Secretary approved despite unverified allegations

WASHINGTON (AP) — Raymond J. Donovan was approved as labor secretary by the Senate yesterday, overcoming persistent, unverified allegations of ties to organized crime.

The vote was 80-17 to confirm Donovan's nomination. He was the last member of President Reagan's Cabinet to win approval.

All the "no" votes were cast by Democrats concerned about the alleged links between Donovan and labor racketeers, despite Donovan's own denials and the FBI's failure to corroborate a single charge.

Republicans said fairness required a vote to confirm Donovan, especially since an extensive FBI investigation turned up nothing.

Donovan, a 50-year-old New Jersey construction executive who served as a campaign fund raiser for Reagan, initially indicated he expected to be sworn in formally later Tuesday at the White House.

Soviet bombers intercepted less than 200 miles off the Cape

OTIS AIR FORCE BASE, Mass. (AP) — Soviet bombers apparently testing U.S. air defenses, were intercepted by Massachusetts Air National Guard fighters less than 200 miles off the Cape Cod coast for the second time in six months, officials revealed yesterday.

Details of the incident Jan. 26 were released by the Air Force. Maj. Richard Penny of the 102nd Fighter-Interceptor Wing, said two F-106 jet fighters from Otis Air Force Base were sent into the air on orders by the North American Air Defense Command. The 102nd provides air defense for New England.

"It was a hot scramble," said Penny. "We received no advance notice."

Union dispute hits area restaurant

By BRIAN SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

Management and union organizers are colliding head-on over efforts to bring a union to Branagan's restaurant in Amherst where a ratification vote is scheduled for next week.

Emphasizing job security, two employees of Branagan's Thomas Quinn and Eric Lieberman have filed with the National Labor Relations Board in an attempt to have employees of the restaurant affiliated with Local 116 of the AFL-CIO. Twenty-one of the restaurant's 30 employees are area students.

David Colson, manager of Branagan's and spokesperson for the Steak Club corporation said the restaurant is opposed to all attempts to bring the union in. Colson also said the organization has employed legal representation to combat efforts to unionize Branagan's.

Employees are scheduled to vote on union representation Feb. 13. Employees at the 1704 restaurant in South Deerfield last week approved Local 116 affiliation.

Lieberman said the effort to gain affiliation with Local 116 did not start until after several employees were fired last fall. Charles DiMare, attorney for the UMass Legal Services Office said he has been giving the students advice on their rights under the circumstances and advising what alternatives are open to them.

Colson said he felt the students had an advantage because they are able to gain free legal advice from the LSO. Colson also felt the rules governing union organization favors students.

"The labor laws were written by employers so certainly they aren't in favor of the unions" said Ed Wall spokesperson for Local 116.

Colson also objected to tactics used by the organizers to get their fellow employees to sign union cards. Colson charged that there were instances where employees signed the cards while "under the influence," of alcohol.

"In one case a person was told if they didn't sign they would lose their job," Colson claimed.

While Lieberman did not deny that some employees had been drinking before they signed their cards, he maintained that at the time they signed they were in complete control of their faculties.

Lieberman said one worker was told that by signing the card he would be protected under law from any action taken by management due to worker involvement in union activity. Lieberman claims he did not threaten workers with their jobs if they did not sign the card. Colson claims Lieberman did not make that threat.

Colson also said he has been offering his employees fact sheets about unions in an effort to discourage employee support for the union.

However DiMare said these fact sheets often had excerpts of the union's by-laws out of context.

Due to the large number of students working at Branagan's, Colson said a union would be worthless because students are short-term employees and would not benefit from seniority clauses and other long-term benefits the union offered.

DiMare said three charges that were brought before NLRB were withdrawn because the hearings came up during intersession and crucial witnesses were unavailable. He said these charges would be refiled if necessary.

DiMare stated that Branagan's transferred an employee of three years after she came out in support of the union. The management of Branagan's said however that the employee didn't come out in support of the union until after she was

Legal aid group seeks protection for emotionally ill

BOSTON (AP) — A legal aid group has asked a federal court to make the state Mental Health Department live up to its own three-year-old code for protecting patients' rights, naming Northampton State Hospital as one of the alleged abusers of patient's rights.

The Coalition for the Legal Rights of the Disabled announced it filed suit in U.S. District Court in Boston yesterday, challenging alleged abuses of patients at Northampton and Taunton state hospitals and two halfway houses, Fortune House and Millie's Cottage.

The suit contends that patients at the facilities had complained about treatment but either were ignored or penalized.

The coalition has asked the court to order the department to inform patients of their rights and to keep a central index on patient complaints.

For the past three years the majority of patients at the Northampton facility have been transferred to community-based programs under an order from a federal district court.

A suit filed in 1976 by Western Mass. Legal services on behalf of patients there charged that patients were being inappropriately placed in the hospital. Even before the 1976 suit, the hospital's patient size was being pared down as part of general trend toward de-institutionalization of mentally ill persons across the state.

Among the specific allegations in the recent group's complaint:

Andrew Spencer, 75, of Northampton claims he was held in restraint and had his mail opened by superiors at Northampton State.

Phyllis McBride, 49, of Plymouth had an argument with a Taunton State Hospital attendant, and, while vomiting, had her head pushed into a toilet bowl by the employee.

George Walsh, 55, a Taunton State patient, was pushed to the ground and suffered head bruises when he tried to embrace a staffperson.

Officials attempt to cope with tax cut impact

State Senator John W. Over, D-Amherst.

By SAMUEL CHALFEN
AND THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Although the state funds and jobs have not yet been eliminated by Proposition 2½, the Governor, an Amherst Senator and an aspiring selectman are all working to cope with its impact.

Governor Edward J. King has hinted he will file a new tax package, and support equitable distribution of funds to less wealthy towns. Senator John W. Olver (D-Amherst), meanwhile, will co-chair committee hearing on the effects on communities.

Locally, University of Massachusetts history professor Richard H. Minear has announced he will run for Selectman next April with opposition ot Proposition 2½ as his major campaign issue.

[illegible] Amherst will lose funding as the state budget is reduced, Olver said. The town of Amherst, if early projections are correct, may have to cut 12 percent from it's property tax levy, he said.

Olver said the hearings are being held to find out from communities and citizens groups what they think the effects of Proposition 2½ are expected to be. The Committee will, after completing the hearings sometime after March, attempt to put together legislation to distribute the burden of proposition 2½ fairly, Olver said.

The legislature has about 30 amendments to the tax reform measure, Olver said, and the committee will draft appropriate legislation to acceptable to both houses of the legislature.

Hearings will also be held in Holyoke in March and later in Worcester, and New Bedford, Olver said.

He also said the need for the hearings comes from communities having "essentially to eat inflation plus perhaps up to a 20 percent cut in their own budget."

On the state level King said yesterday it is a "distinct possibility" that he will file a tax package to redistribute the load among state revenue sources. But he said this would not increase the total tax burden on the public.

An example, he said in an interview, would be to eliminate the auto excise tax and replace lost revenue with increases in the sales tax.

King also said he may support a change in the state aid distribution formulas to give more money to communities hard hit by Proposition 2½ and less to the wealthier communities.

King noted that the auto excise tax already has been slashed by 3/4ths. He said the revenue the levy now produces is "relatively small, but it takes a large bureaucracy to administer nonetheless."

Eliminating that tax altogether and increasing the sales tax to make up for the revenue is a possibility, he said.

Endorsing on King's plans, Ron Lyons, a press aide, emphasized the governor is contemplating "changes in the basics of taxation."

"He would go along with changes, but not increasing the total tax burden to make up for losses under Proposition 2½."

Lyons said that, with respect to the excise tax, "it is simply something that might be looked into." To date, he said, King "[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [

Zoning to be discussed by Planning Board

The town of Amherst Planning Board, which is developing zoning amendments to increase housing in town, will meet at 7:30 tonight in the Town Room of Town Hall.

According to Planning Board Chair Elisa Campbell, the board is considering deleting requirement that two family dwellings be allowed only in cluster developments. This would make it possible for duplexes to be established in residential neighborhoods, she said.

The board is also considering allowing row houses sometimes called town houses, in residential districts at a density no greater than six dwelling units per acre.

The Board is also working on regulations covering the conversion of one and two family dwellings to multi-unit dwellings. Campbell said it is expected these proposed zoning amendments will be ready for the March town meeting.

A public hearing on all proposed zoning amendments will be held on March 18.

History professor announces candidacy

Richard H. Minear, professor of History at UMass, has announced he will be a candidate for election to the Amherst Board of Selectmen on April 17.

Minear is also a current member of the Planning Board and a town meeting member.

Minear has listed the blockage of Proposition 2½ budget cutbacks as his first priority if elected. Minear anticipates that Amherst, which rejected the referendum by a 7 to 2 margin last November, will be allowed to rescind the proposition by this November when and if Governor King approves such legislation.

Minear received his bacheler's degree from Yale, his masters and Ph.D. from Harvard, and is a former Fulbright scholar.

Other candidates for the two three-year seats are incumbent Roger Jacques, and Edith Wilkinson, wife of UMass social science professor R.D. Wilkinson. Another incumbent selectwoman Diana Remer, will not run due to health reasons.

'Plot neglected' in Raging Bull

By TOM FAHEY
Collegian Staff

Martin Scorsese's Raging Bull is the latest entry in the new wave of American Filmmaking. When epic detail and realism were sacrificed for sentimentality and the convenience of a flowing story, the opposite is now the case. A character's personality, and even his individuality is now replaced by "realistic" accents, as accurate acting and camera angles that often tell too little by showing too much.

A major complaint by critics when discussing these new films is that the emphasis on the individual scene has overflowed the basic fundamentals of the narrative. This was prevalent in "Apocalypse Now", "Kramer vs. Kramer," "The Black Stallion," and even "The Elephant Man." Unfortunately, this is also obvious in "Raging Bull." The creators of this film were so saturated with getting every scene just right, that they forgot to intertwine them into one complete film. Is this bad? Well the most gifted writer in American literature, F. Scott Fitzgerald, couldn't tell a story to save his life either, but that never stopped millions of people from enjoying the poetry of the language, did it?

In the earlier days of filmmaking, writers and actresses were picked for their looks rather than their acting ability. And makeup men and hairdressers were equally as important in establishing an effect. In fact, the star of this film, one of the best actors since today, Robert DeNiro, is so unrecognizable that he is not recognized on the street, by the general public. The cuts and jarring scenes of the film, (by Peed and Patty Mariarty), are not experienced as one at all, but rather as temporary events and a model who were not chosen for their acting but for their resemblance to the real life characters that they portray.

Generally, when you see Raging Bull, one can't help but feel intimidated and brainwashed by the erotic penetration. every scene is not only credible for the literal detail and manner, but also teeming with an undercurrent of drama and violent intensity that can only be created by the finest filmmakers.

The plot, which is centered on the life of ex-middleweight champion of the world Jake La Motta, was chosen by Scorsese for it's great dramatic potential. The focus of this particular story is not on prizefighting, nor on the rise to the top, but rather, one man's relationship with his brother and his wife. The scenes between the La Motta brothers, Jake and Joe, are so carefully staged and acted that the viewer cannot help but feel shocked and intimidated by their close intimacy. However, audiences tend to become slightly detached from the action as the viewer whether from distance for the characters themselves, or from the inability to understand them as complete one of the top 10 positions in the world and thoroughly view.

Joe Pesci and Cathy Moriarty are believable as the characters they play because not only do they look and act like the people they portray, but they take their jobs seriously and put everything that they have into the parts. Like DeNiro, they both rehearsed for months before the shooting and tried to become their characters in every way possible. As Kevin Quill, a noted N.Y. film historian, was quoted as saying, "it's not really hard for a girl from the Bronx, to play a girl from the Bronx." "Most will only tell if both of these actors will be able to break from their molds and explore new horizons.

When one considers the final analysis, it's not really the look of the actors that their characters, we realize how accurate they may appear to the eye and to the ear, to ring false in retrospection. EDITORIAL/OPINION

Past her prime, she still gets a song and dance

I have tried to get into a dance class at UMass for many years. I will be 30 tomorrow. Excepting my mother, I am the oldest living student at UMass. I have taken every course the University has to offer, but I have never managed to get into a dance class.

Every semester I bring my addition form to the first day of dance class. So do two hundred other women, and a few good-looking men who quickly get pushed to the back. One girl stands with her hands clasped. "Please God," she says, "If I don't get this class my schedule will die. I'll never be able to save it." Another screams, "But I'm a dance major! How can I be a dance major if I never get in to any dance classes!" Another girl zips off her shirt, "Look!" she cries, "I've all dressed for class! I'm ready to start! Take me!"

I tap my name on the teacher's head. "I've can't be fooled in these situations. "Excuse me," I say. "I've been trying to get into a dance class for 12 semesters. What's wrong anyhow? Does the dance department hate me?"

The teacher is crying. I suppose her ass hurt. "It's not my fault!" she sobs. "The computer picks out the people to be in the class."

"What about seniority?" I say flashing my senior citizen's card.

"Doesn't matter. The computer picks people at random so it's fair."

"What's fair about that? Why don't they open another section?" I gesture toward the lines of arms waving purple forms, snaking around Worcester Dining Commons into North Pleasant St.

"The University doesn't have enough money. They had to buy a lot of planks to cover up the holes in the Campus Center Ceiling." The girl behind me screams, "If I don't get this class, I'm going to throw up the dance department!"

"Sis-boom-bah," says the teacher. "Try and find it."

I decide to do just that. Find the dance department and discover why no one in the University can get into a dance class.

The dance department is not easy to find. It's not in the main part of campus, that's all I know. It's in a separate cluster of dank corridors. Rats in mascara run on the floor seeking raisins. The [illegible] stairs with [illegible].

Don't get squished

Hey all you devotees out there. I know you've got a lot of things on your minds at this point in the semester, some of which I am sure are the bus safety rules. However, I feel it necessary to bring the rules to your attention that are most often ignored.

1. NEVER WALK BEHIND OR THE BUSSES AT THE BUS STOP—the bus could easily roll and we wouldn't want you to get squished.

2. NEVER CROSS IN FRONT OF THE BUS—we are not a regulation yellow bus, we do not have to stop when the bus stops, and believe me they don't. Cross in back of the bus or wait till the bus has left the stop before crossing.

3. DO NOT TRY TO STOP THE BUS WHEN IT IS IN MOTION—once the bus has operator and is pulling out of the bus stop, do not try to stop the bus. It's hard enough division mentality.

This quote is from a piece with other of their printed and verbal statements. While I normally take a antidemocratic-unity attitude toward Leftists maneuvers [illegible], like mine, that I believe leftist organizations, both on principle and out of self-interest, should refuse to associate with it in any way.

The John Brown's "Idiot Klan" Committee has no place in a legitimately progressive movement.

Air Force drops sickle cell ban

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Air Force yesterday dropped its ban against admission to the Air Force of anybody who has a sickle cell trait. Lt. Gen. Paul W. Myers, Air Force surgeon general, announced that, as of Monday, "candidates for the Air Force Academy who have the sickle cell trait are not eligible for admission, provided they are otherwise medically qualified and meet the standard entrance requirements."

Persons with sickle cell trait have been barred from admission to the academy and from duty with air crews since 1973. Medical studies have shown that blacks have a greater prevalence of the sickle cell trait than do whites, Air Force officials said.

The ban at the academy in Colorado Springs, Colo., and on service with air crews was imposed by the Air Force, officals said, after a couple of black cadets exhibited serious health problems in 1972. It was found that these cadets had the sickle cell trait and that such a trait could cause medical difficulties at high altitudes. The Air Force Academy is located high in the Rockies.

Air Force sources said a former black cadet who was separated from the academy in 1979 has filed a class action suit in Minneapolis challenging the ban.

Maj. Douglas Kennett, an Air Force spokesman, said that the dropping of the ban resulted from an 11th-hour order by Carter administration Deputy Defense Secretary W. Graham Claytor.

In his statement, Myers said that a special medical program will closely monitor the health of each cadet found to have the sickle cell trait.

"This precaution will assure that any health problem will be promptly recognized and treated," the Air Force surgeon general said.

Senators claim fuel adjustment threatens state

By DAVID HERN
Associated Press

BOSTON — The fuel adjustment clause in utility bills is threatening to depopulate Massachusetts, an angry legislator said yesterday.

A parade of senators and representatives, plus consumer groups, pleaded for action at a lengthy hearing before the Committee on Government Regulations. None said how a "strong" fuel adjustment reform bill they backed would help, but they were united on one point: something has to be done.

"If you don't want a mass exodus of people from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, then for God's sake, do something about this fuel adjustment clause," Rep. Elizabeth Metayer, D-Braintree, said.

Mrs. Metayer said some constituents have threatened to withhold the fuel adjustment part of their electric bills.

The clause permits utilities to pass on fuel cost increases directly to consumers. A source close to the utilities explained privately that for years a cost of $2 per barrel of oil was employed in rate-setting. It jumped to $12 in 1973, meaning increases of $400,000 passed on to consumers, and since has more than doubled.

Also addressing the gathering in half-filled Gardner Auditorium, Mary L. Fonseca, D-Fall River, stressed fuel adjustment is second only to Proposition 2½ among issues facing the Legislature.

Actor Keith Gordon, at right, was nine years old in May 1970, when shots rang out at Kent State University in Ohio and a confrontation between National Guardsmen and antiwar protestors left four students dead. Today, Gordon portrays one of the slain students in a made-for-TV film, "Kent State," to be broadcast by NBC Sunday night.

Union members picket ground breaking of automotive facility

By DEAN FOSDICK
Associated Press

SMYRNA, Tenn. — Officials of a Japanese automaker who broke ground here yesterday for a $300 million truck plant were jeered by a crowd protesting selection of a contractor who hires non-union labor.

Tires were slashed on a Datsun truck with a snowplow used for the groundbreaking. The vehicle had to be driven with flat tires to ceremoniously move ground.

Tennessee's governor apologized to visiting officials and welcomed the automaker to the right-to-work state.

The Nissan Motor Co. Ltd. plant will be the largest automotive facility ever built in the United States by a foreign manufacturer. The site also will be the corporate headquarters of Nissan Motor Manufacturing Corp. U.S.A.

The project represents the biggest investment outside Japan for the producer of Datsun vehicles.

Most of the 1,500 people who turned out for the ceremony were union members who waved picket signs, shouted and booed to show their disagreement with the choice of Daniel Construction Co., of Greenville, S.C., as prime contractor for the plant. The company hires both union and nonunion labor.

scene success in "Mean Streets" but in Raging Bull it just looks like a short cut.

Perhaps the most striking scene in the entire film is towards the end when Jake, now broken and bloated, is reduced to introducing strippers in Manhattan's West Side in the late 1960's. DeNiro's portrayal of a man who once fought his way to the championship of the world, diminished to exchanging verbal jabs with a bunch of derelicts cannot be easily forgotten by anyone who experiences it.

Maybe this scene is typical of the philosophy of the entire film. With so much attention paid to individual details, the plot is neglected, and therefore there is no base to build on. And in film, if there is no base, there can be no heart, and there can be no soul. And without a soul, all that is left, is a beautiful china doll; lovely to look at, but hollow, empty, and cold inside.

Colson said a person working for an establishment under the jurisdication of Local 116 would have to gain permission from the union to be able to work at another establishment affiliated with Local 116.

Wall termed the statement "ridiculous." He said the union doesn't place employees and that they work where ever they want.

A YEAR OUT OF COLLEGE, ANDA STRAUSS IS MAKING AVIATION HISTORY IN THE ARMY.
"I'm being assigned to a Chinook helicopter unit in Germany as a test pilot and maintenance officer, and I'm proud that I'll be the first woman to have that assignment over there. It's a real thrill for me.
"So was learning how to fly a helicopter. It takes a lot more skill than an airplane. If you think college is demanding, flight school is even tougher. It's not only academically demanding, it's really mentally demanding as well as physically.
"In Germany, I'll have a chance to use some of the leadership and management techniques I learned in ROTC. It's going to be a real challenge having command responsibilities.
"I got into ROTC really just to see what it was all about. For me, it all couldn't have worked out better."
Army ROTC got Anda Strauss off to a good start. Maybe it can do the same for you. To find out, stop by your Army ROTC office on campus.

Ali may promote boxing card

NEW YORK (AP) — Muhammad Ali may have changed his mind again, indicating Tuesday that he might step in after all and try to salvage a boxing show tangled in charges of a $21.3 million bank fraud.

Ali said he might help promote a scheduled boxing card at Madison Square Garden Feb. 23, which is rich in purses and talent but which was in serious jeopardy.

Muhammad Ali Professional Sports Inc. was to have put on the card, but the main figures in that group have vanished and on Monday were charged in a lawsuit with embezzlement of $21.3 million from the Wells Fargo National Bank of California.

MAPS, which has raised questions in boxing circles for months about the source of its wealth, paid Ali a promotional fee for use of his name. Otherwise, it had no direct connection with the former threetime heavyweight champion.

The Well Fargo suit, filed in state Superior Court, alleges that the fraud was "accomplished by internal manipulation of funds involving 13 separate accounts."

Among the defendants was Harold Smith, chairman of MAPS, and Benjamin Lewis, a MAPS director who most recently was operations manager of a Wells Fargo branch in Beverly Hills, Calif. Both Smith and Lewis have been missing for about a week.

Wrestlers take on Wildcats

By DONNA SULLIVAN

Coming off two strong wins over Albany (37-7) and Southern Connecticut State College (31-7), and a controversial 20-20 tie with St. Lawrence University, the Massachusetts wrestling team travels to Durham, NH today to face a University of New Hampshire squad that was last year trounced by the matmen.

The Wildcats were plagued by injuries and sickness last season and head coach Jim Erquhart brought just six men to Boyden and watched his team get clobbered 48-3.

Last week, the near perfect UMass record got another tally in the tie column after a meet with St. Lawrence, who failed to produce a certified official. A St. Lawrence assistant coach was the substitute official who made some questionable calls.

According to UMass head coach Dave Amato, 158 pound Mike Carroll was winning 11-2 when he got knocked out. The ref didn't see it and Carroll was pinned.

Amato is looking ahead to this Friday's meet against Springfield College.

"They have a strong team, they always wrestle well against us," he said. So well, that last year was the first time UMass beat the Chiefs since Amato was a UMass wrestler in 1972.

The battle will take place in Boyden gym Friday night at 7 p.m.

was bright yet temperatures remained in the twenties. The winner of the race was Lisa Klein of Brown who had won the two previous slalom races. In second was UMass' Sweepy Voll, Collins took third, and Bobbi Voll was fifth.

The Sunday slalom saw UMass edge out Plymouth by seven tenths of a second. Amherst College was a distant third. Brown's Klein won the event once again and remains unbeaten in slalom this season. Second place went to Jenny Davis of Plymouth and third and fourth went to UMass' Sweepy Voll and Collins. Bobbi Voll was the third finisher for UMass, eleventh overall. She fell on her first run but still finished, and then had the fastest time on her second run.

Two standouts on the women's team so far this season are Sweepy Voll and Collins. Voll, who won nine of the ten races last year as a freshman has two giant slalom victories, two seconds, and no worse than a fifth place finish this year. Collins is not far behind with a third place finish, a string of fourths, and her worst finish is fifth. Both these women show extreme consistency not failing in a single race this season.

The women's ski team enters their last regular season races when they travel to Okemo Mt. in Vermont this weekend. A slalom will be held on Saturday and two giant slaloms on Sunday. One of which will be making up the cancelled race at Waterville.

Borg player of month, Austin joins Lloyd in Crown tourney

NEW YORK AP — Sweden's Bjorn Borg, winner of the Masters tennis tournament, has been named Volvo Grand Prix Player of the Month for January, it was announced Tuesday.

The five-time Wimbledon champion earned his second straight Masters title by defeating Ivan Lendl of Czechoslovakia 6-4, 6-2, 6-2 in the final at Madison Square Garden.

Defending champion Tracy Austin has become the second player named to the four player field for the $200,000 Clairol Crown tennis tournament, to be held April 4-5 in Carlsbad, Calif.

Austin, who beat Martina Navratilova in straight sets last year to capture the $100,000 first prize, joins U.S. Open champion Chris Evert Lloyd in this year's field.

Three-game win streak ruined

Chiefs top hoopwomen 66-64

By KEVIN CULLEN
Collegian Staff

SPRINGFIELD—It was among the most bitter pills the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team has swallowed in some time.

Behind 30 points from Anita Thomas, and thanks to a six minute UMass scoring drought, Springfield College put an end to a three-game UMass win streak, 66-64 last night before a noisy crowd of 200 jammed into the tiny Greek Cultural Center gymnasium.

Julie Ready's 19 points were not enough for UMass (12-8) as Thomas and Randi Zola, who had 16 for the winners, combined for all but 20 of Springfield's points.

"Springfield simply wanted the game more than we did," head coach Mary Ann Ondarski said. "You can't win ball games scoring two points in six or seven minutes."

In a slow moving, foul-filled first half, UMass shooting 37% on the evening most of the way, grabbing an 11-6 lead, as ball handler Wendy Ward broke the Springfield press consistently and fed Ready and Nadine Jackson inside.

Jackson and co-captain Ginger Legare controlled the boards on both ends of the court sustaining UMass during one of their poorer shooting halves.

Springfield tied the score for the first of four times in the half on a Zola jumper which made it 17-17 at the ten-minute mark.

UMass then build up a six point lead, its biggest of the half, when two Ward baskets made it 29-23 with four minutes left.

Springfield, which has come back consistently all year, did so last night, as leading scorer Thomas hit a three point play and a layup inside the one minute mark to give Springfield its first lead, 35-33, since Zola's opening basket. The half ended with Springfield up by a point, 36-35.

The second half saw Springfield come out fired up. After a Ready layup gave UMass a short-lived 39-38 lead, two Thomas baskets and a Sharon Price turnaround gave Springfield a 46-41 lead.

Legare's right-side jumper brought UMass to within one and Ready's three point play at 12:03 tied it at 54. The see-saw action continued as the score was tied at three different intervals before Jackson literally bowled over Price following a Ward miss, and (before) finished off the hustle play with a nifty inside move to give UMass a 62-60 lead with 1:14 left to play.

It was here the drought hit, worse than any California has seen in season years and Thomas' outside shooting gave Springfield a 66-62 lead.

With 2:08 left and UMass down by four, Ondarski called a timeout. Springfield turned the ball over and at 1:38 Ready brought them to 66-64, with a layup off a pass from Ward, breaking the drought of nearly six minutes.

With 1:12 remaining Jackson missed a jumper but Ward hustled herself a jump ball and on the ensuing tap Legare controlled and was fouled. On the inbound pass Collins missed, but Legare got a jump ball. Jackson missed again and this time there was no jump ball.

Springfield brought it down and after the foul controlled the ball with a disciplined four-corners offense killing the clock and a UMass three-game win streak.

UMass assistant coach Steve Jefferson protested that Jackson had fouled Price with two seconds left on the clock—which she did, but the referee disallowed the protest claiming the timer could hear the whistle over the crowd.

"This loss really hurt us. We're just going to have to come back and play the way we're capable of playing," Ondarski said, "We control our own destinies."

SPRINGFIELD (66)
Playdon 2-0-2, Price 2-1-5, Zola 7-0-14, Thompson 1-1-3, Thomas 12-6-30, Halstead 3-7-13
UMASS (64)
Julie Ready 8-3-19, Jenny Gray 0-0-0, Wendy Ward 30-6, Nadine Jackson 5-2-12, Sherry Collins 2-0-4, Marlene Susienka 1-0-2, Tricia Corcoran 3-0-6, Martha Ready 0-0-0, Cindy Clapp 1-1-3, Ginger Legare 5-2-12

Minutemen host G Washington at Cage tonight

By KEVIN CULLEN
Collegian Staff

If it is ever going to happen—it meaning the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team winning an Eastern Eight game—it will have to happen tonight. When the Minutemen take on George Washington University at 7:30 at the Cage.

UMass, which last won an Eastern Eight league game on 1978, when they defeated Pittsburgh 71-68 in the days of Calhoun and Eldridge, takes on a GW team that is having nearly as many problems as the Minutemen themselves. GW has won just one of six Eastern Eight encounters this season, that being a 62-60 win over St. Bonaventure, a week ago.

GW's 4-15 overall mark is not much better than the UMass record of 5-14 (0-5 in league play). The Colonials are coming off two non-league losses to Virginia Tech and that unbeliever powerhouse Mount St. Mary's College of Emmitsburg, Maryland.

UMass and GW are the only two teams in the Eastern Eight whose scoring margin is negative (the two teams share the cellar in rebounding, team field goal percentage and team field goal percentage defense).

Bearing all that in mind, tonight could be a hell of a game.

Both teams are fairly evenly matched. Top scorer for the Colonials has been guard Wilbert Snipper who has been averaging about 16 points per game, followed closely by teammate Oscar Wilmington (6-6-in-3 forward) nicked the a consistent Dave Carney), who is averaging a bit under that.

Leading GW rebounder has been Paul Graves a 6-6 forward who's been pulling down seven per game. Graves also leads the Eastern Eight in field goal percentage shooting nearly 60- percent.

GW does have two fine guards in Buddy Davis and veteran Curtis Jeffries. Davis has been averaging nearly four assists per game, while Jeffries has experience and a decent shooting touch.

UMass, which has lost six straight, will have GW tonight minus sophomore forward Dan Wright, for whom nothing has gone right this year. After breaking an ankle in a Thanksgiving day practice session and missing most of the season, Wright was playing hard, averaging 10 points per game, only to be injured on weekend practice Monday.

It's the battle of the Eastern Eight cellar dwellers tonight at the Cage, and it could get interesting.

Women skiers in top form

place. The Minutemen have also been consistent in the meets which include five other teams. Plymouth State College of New Hampshire has proven to be the team's toughest competition as it holds second place in the league with one first place finish and five seconds. Boston College is third followed by Amherst, Stowe and Smith College.

The season began on the weekend of Jan. 17 and 18 at Berkshire East in Charlemont. There was a slalom on the first day and a giant slalom the next. The UMass women were able to take both events. The team results are determined by taking the three best racers' times out of the five competing and adding them up. Sophomore Stacey Vail led UMass both days with a second and first place finish overall. Transfer student Patricia Collins (from New Mexico) was number two finisher for the team both days and Sue Gundy was third in the slalom while the giant slalom saw Robbi Vail (Stacey's sibling in law).

The next weekend the team traveled to Lyon Mt., New Hampshire for two races. Plymouth won the slalom event on Saturday and UMass racked up second with Boston College third. The giant slalom 4GPs saw UMass pull out a close one winning by only five tenths of a second. The three top finishers for UMass both days were Stacey Vail, Collins, and Gundy.

This past weekend UMass won both slalom races at Waterville Valley N.H. The GS on Monday was cancelled because of the rain which made the visibility poor and the snow difficult to ski.

The courses were set on the same slope used for international World Cup races that were held after the Olympics. The courses took approximately 60 seconds for the best women to complete. It started on a steep pitch full moving a fair section and ended with several rolling knolls. The varying terrain made for difficult racing and resulted in many falls.

The UMass women turned in a very strong performance on the first day as they took second place Plymouth by 10 seconds. The day was a perfect day for a race as the sun

UM-Boston library named for Healy

By DEBORAH ASBRAND
Collegian Staff

BOSTON—The University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees, in its last regularly scheduled session, yesterday announced its decision to name the UMass Boston Library after the Board's 11-year chairman.

Joseph P. Healey, president and chairman of the board of a Boston area bank, was honored for his 21 years of service to the University that began with his appointment to the Board of Trustees in 1969.

In 1969, Healey was voted chairman of the 24 member board and has held the position since. The board and Healy's chairmanship will cease to exist when the Board of Regents takes over the reigns of state colleges and universities on March 1.

Trustees also approved a doctoral program in environmental studies for the UMass Boston Campus. Trustee Joseph Frank, faculty representive from the Amherst campus, questioned the need for that type of program at Boston because environmental studies is a strong program on the Amherst campus.

UMass President David C. Knapp raised similar questions last month.

But some trustees almost bitterly defended the Boston program, claiming it was unique to Boston and served needs different from the Amherst program.

Trustee Sylvia Burak also protested the interference from the Amherst Campus, "I can't recall a time when the Boston campus commented on an Amherst Ph.D proposal."

Underlying the dispute is a rift between some top University administrators over the fate of UMass-Boston if a proposed merger between Boston State College and UMass-Boston is implemented.

Some Amherst campus administrators have indicated they would not mind the separation of UMass-Boston from Amherst.

Also during their last meeting, which was held amidst the plush decor of Boston's Park Plaza Hotel, Trustee Barney Troy announced that the Committee of Faculty and Educational Policy had approved plans to establish the UMass Worcester Medical School Center on Aging.

Troy said the proposed center would facilitate research on the process of aging, provide service programs for the elderly and act as an information center for outside groups.

In business concerning the Amherst campus, Building and Grounds Committee member Paul Marks said consultants will be hired to study cracks that appeared on the outer brick wall of the 20-year-old Bartlett Hall, causing it to bulge out in several places.

Marks also announced the committee had approved plans for the renovation of 70-year-old Marshall Hall as part of a program to renovate some of the older science buildings on campus.

Yesterday's meeting was the end of a 118-year guidance of UMass by the Board of Trustees. Most Board members said their farewells and extended congratulations and gratitude to the rest of the Board.

"It has been a great honor and privilege for me to chair this Board," said Healey. "I can't think of anything that means more to me."

"I'd like to thank the Board for the help they've given the students at Amherst," said student trustee Richard LaVoice.

Trustees urge tri-campus system during final business meeting

BOSTON—After congratulating themselves as a unit and praising each other as individuals, the 24 member University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees ended their final meeting yesterday saying they were proud of what they had accomplished for the school.

"The state is fortunate to have this sort of leadership," said Chairman Joseph P. Healy of his colleagues. "We leave with a sense of satisfaction."

The board, comprised of educators, business executives and two student representatives, will relinquish its authority over the UMass system on March 1 to the newly created Board of Regents. The Regents will govern all state institutions of higher education.

Although their final meeting agenda was business as usual, most of the politically inclined board members spent a good portion of the meeting throwing their weight in support of the UMass/Boston campus in relation to the UMass/Amherst campus.

There has been some debate among university administrators over the possibility of removing the Boston campus from the UMass system if a proposed merger between UMass/Boston and Boston State University is implemented.

"The Board is saying loud and clear that they want Boston to remain part of the University system," said Healy. "We've reiterated that policy time and time again."

The final trustee meeting, which was held at the Park Plaza Hotel, was followed by a reception. Trustees received silver plates embossed with the University seal from UMass President David C. Knapp.

Faculty eyes merger; wary of implications

By TAMYEL CHALAPEN
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts at Amherst faculty members are questioning the way the new Board of Regents is overseeing and planning a possible merger of Boston State College with the University of Massachusetts at Boston.

There are two plans to merge the institutions. Under the first, Boston State College would be absorbed into the UMass system with one Board of Trustees to govern the Amherst, Boston and Worcester campuses.

Under the second plan the Boston State College and UMass-Boston would combine to form a "city university". The "city university" would have a separate Board of Trustees governing it from the UMass Amherst and Worcester campuses.

"To date, discussions appear to have been focusing on the two units which are to be merged, Boston State College and UMass Boston. It would seem desirable to monitor a broader audience and I would urge the Board of Regents Task Force to consider holding additional hearings, perhaps even in other parts of the state so that other perspectives might be presented," Associate Professor Paul Jennings said in a statement at the public hearings in Boston last Monday.

Jennings also said in the statement that the campuses serve different needs of their students. Ann Keefe, one of undergraduate co-presidents Kirk Brown and Ann LaVoice have said the UMass/Amherst campus, with about 80 doctoral programs, and as a residential university, has a greater diversity of programs and offers a more traditional education than UMass Boston.

Keefe said he is concerned that the issue is not being looked at as having state-wide ramifications. Others are of representatives and senators representing the needs of the community members involved in the reorganization. Keefe said, with only Senator John Olver, D-Amherst, and Representative James Collins, D-Amherst, to serve the needs of the Amherst community.

Keefe said he is concerned with the fact that the largest issue of state-wide higher educational reorganization is not being addressed.

There will be an open meeting of the full Board of Regents next Tuesday at 10 a.m. on the 10th floor of the McCormack Building in Boston, Keefe said.

Reagan defends cuts; travels to Capitol Hill

By TERENCE HUNT
Associated Press

WASHINGTON - President Ronald Reagan, trying to build a foundation of congressional support for politically unpopular budget cuts, made an extraordinary trip to Capitol Hill yesterday to sell his case to Senate and House leaders.

Today, he will begin his effort to sell the program to the American public, with a televised speech to the nation. White House press secretary James S. Brady said the address was undergoing "substantial rewriting" by the president.

The president has come under increasing pressure to assuage fears that his efforts to stem the growth of the federal budget will not be made at the expense of the poor and most needy in the nation.

Brady said the president, in formulating his economic program, was trying to "weed out the greedy to help the needy."

"No programs that are a safety net for the poor, the indigent and the truly needy are going to be eliminated," he said.

Reagan met with three black leaders, the Rev. Ralph David Abernathy, Hosea Williams and Charles Evers.

European leaders still oppose U.S. neutron weapons

LONDON (AP) — Western European leaders reacted with cautious opposition yesterday to fresh prospects of U.S. deployment of neutron weapons in Europe.

In Moscow, the Soviet news agency Tass accused President Reagan's administration of trying to "blackmail" Western European nations into deploying the weapons against the Soviet Union. It said U.S. Defense Secretary Casper Weinberger's statements favoring the weapons "evoked indignation and fear around the world."

In Washington, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. David C. Jones, said he also favored use of enhanced radiation weapons in Western Europe should be considered, "but I caution it's important how we do it."

Weinberger said Tuesday he was leaning toward deployment of the controversial neutron weapon, which had been first promoted and then shelved by the Carter administration in 1978.

Some members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization criticized Carter at the time for inconsistency, but most seemed relieved that the issue had been dropped.

West German government spokesman Klaus Becker called Weinberger's statements a "vague formulation" that should be examined with "supreme patience" by NATO as a whole.

Such an opportunity would probably not occur before the NATO defense ministers' meeting next May, he said.

Polish leaders warn of consequences

WARSAW, Poland — Negotiations aimed at ending a crippling local strike in southern Poland broke down yesterday and independent unionists called for reinforcements while the government warned of "consequences."

Independent labor leader Lech Walesa, on hand in Bielsko-Biala for the talks, told The Associated Press: "It is better to fall while carrying one's head high than to retreat ignominously.

"We are not afraid," said the leader of the 10 million member independent labor federation Solidarity.

Warsaw Radio said government negotiators headed by Czeslaw Kotela, deputy minister of administration, local economy and environment, returned to Warsaw after the talks failed. It said no date was set for a possible resumption.

Continuing labor unrest in this Soviet-bloc nation has raised fears of a possible Soviet-led military intervention like that in Czechoslovakia in 1968.

Bankruptcy possible for Boston schools

BOSTON (AP) — A spokesman for Mayor Kevin H. White announced yesterday that Boston's schools could go broke and be closed for the year next week.

Barring legislative or judicial intervention, the state Supreme Court was told that the school system has used up its appropriation and no further costs can be incurred.

The potential crisis was the issue of a suit by the school committee and 10 taxpayers against the mayor and other city officials.

The pending school shutdown was reported by Stephen H. Oleskey, the city's lawyer, in the continuing budget battle with the school committee.

White held the schools to the 1979-80 spending limit. School officials said this can't work because of past deficit financing.

Previously, there had been reports the system would go broke in late March.

The immediate issue is the school board's demand that $46 million be appropriated for special education, in addition to the $195 million allowance.

Students walk out to protest Prop 2½

DEERFIELD, — Chanting "Stop the Prop" and other anti-Proposition 2½ slogans, about 300 of the 525 students at Frontier Regional High School walked out of classes briefly yesterday to protest proposed budget cuts.

The students rallied outside the school, then marched to the Deerfield Town Hall to voice their displeasure with a proposed 20 percent cut in the school department's budget. The move could affect minor sports, extra curricular activities and some classes such as art, music and home economics.

"What is ironic is that people most affected by these cuts didn't get a chance to vote," said student Jackie Massons.

Teachers did not participate in the protest, but did not intervene when students walked out of classrooms at 8:30 a.m., according to principal Gordon Nasewarthy.

Enviromentalists say bury power lines

BOSTON — Warning of alleged health hazards ranging from lethargy to cancer, environmentalists urged the Massachusetts Legislature yesterdayday to require the burial of most new high-voltage lines in the state, including the Seabrook grid.

Representatives of Greenpeace New England and STOP (Safe Transmission of Power) appeared before the Government Regulations Committee, seeking a law mandating an underground route for any new line carrying 231 kilovolts or more.

"If you stand beneath a 345 kilovolt transmission line with a 40-watt fluorescent bulb in your hand, the bulb will light up," said Rep. Nicholas J. Costello, the bill's sponsor describing the powerful electromagnetic forces created by high-tension power lines.

State rep caught in sodomy roundup

WASHINGTON — Rep. Jon C. Hinson, R-Miss., and three other persons were arrested yesterday on sodomy charges, police said.

According to an account by District of Columbia police, Hinson and a library assistant were arrested at 1 p.m. in the Longworth House Office Building by Capitol police. The D.C. police said the pair were charged with oral sodomy.

At 2:15 p.m., Capitol police arrested two other persons, identified only as a lobbyist and a legislative assistant. They were charged with oral and rectal sodomy, D.C. police said.

Hinson was re-elected to a second term in Congress last fall despite his disclosure that he had been involved in two incidents related to homosexual activity.

New director named for student activities

By ED LEVINE
Collegian Staff

After nearly two years, the University of Massachusetts has a new director of student activities.

Franklin Durand "Randy" Donant, the former assistant director of the Student Activities Planning Center at the California Polytechnic State University in San Luis Obispo, will begin later this month as director of the Student Activities Office, the business and coordination office for more than 400 Recognized Student Organizations (RSO groups).

Bryan Harvey, an assistant to Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis L. Madson said Donant, who was hired by Madson in January and will begin sometime next week, "seemed very perceptive" about the UMass system when he visited here last semester.

Harvey said Donant will be the first permanent director in the office since Bud Demers vacated the position in the summer of 1979. Subsequent acting directors have been the subject of much controversy among student leaders who often clashed with the director over policy decisions.

Since 1979, the office has been filled by O.C. Bobby Daniels, an associate in the Dean of Students office, and most recently by David Bousquet, the assistant director of student activities.

A committee of students and administrators had conducted interviews with several candidates in November and December and, according to some student comittee members, forwarded their recommendations to Madson. Some students on the committee had said that Madson had not chosen the candidates they had recommended.

Madson was out of town and couuld not be reached for comment yesterday and Harvey said he was unaware of the situation.

Maryanne Kowalski of the UMass News Bureau said Donant received a bachelor of arts degree in history from the University of California Polytechnic at Santa Barbara and a masters degree in education at California Polytechnic. He is also a doctoral candidate at Arizona State university, she said.

fire and worked in the housing office while studying at California Polytechnic, Kowalski said. He has also worked as a junior high school teacher in Los Angeles.

In his most recent position at California Polytechnic, Donant served as advisor to the student programming board, which sponsored various concerts and speaking engagements; was an instructor in group dynamics and leadership; and advised the student craft center, the intra-fraternity council and the human relations committee, Kowalski said.

"He has a good solid backround and training," Harvey said. "He has alot of good ideas and is organizationally very methodical. (He) looks very positive."

Group challenges bid laws

By BRIAN SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

A former University of Massachusetts building official is heading an effort by a coalition of public interest and construction groups to repeal the state's system of awarding sub-contracts on public construction.

Evan Johnston, former Vice Chairman of the UMass Building Authority, and coalition members announced their support in Boston Tuesday for a bill which proposes overturning a law requiring contractors and sub-contractors to file separate bids on state contracts.

House bill 2934, filed by Rep. Angelo Marotta, D-Medford, would allow contractors to choose their own sub-contractors in state construction jobs, a move Johnston said would save millions of dollars in the long run.

Other groups in the 13-member coalition supporting the legislation include Common Cause, Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group, the League of Women Voters and Associated Builders and Contractors.

A similar measure was dropped from the legislature's contract reform bill last year although it was recommended by the state commission on corruption in state building contracts.

The Ward Commission, the blue ribbon panel which probed corruption in state buildings, cited the present sub-bid system as a major factor in defective state buildings.

Johnston said the present system cost the Commonwealth nearly $10.1 billion since it was put into use 20 years ago. It has cost nearly $83 million to UMass alone, Johnston said.

Johnston said students have to pay for those costs through higher tuitions. Johnston also blamed the closing of the library and among other problems on campus on the present sub-bid system. The new system may cost more, Johnston said, but "it is better to pay more now and get a quality product than have to go back later and make costly repairs."

Candy counter countered

By CARLA R. LESH
Collegian Staff

The Economic Development Council (EDC), a student co-operative advocacy group, is holding a rally at 4p.m. today in the Commonwealth Room of the Student Union Building to discuss the construction of the new candy counter in the building.

Peter Taggart, representative of the group, said the student run co-op's feel threatened by the enlarged candy counter which will become a "7-11" type convenience store. The EDC is concerned with the Campus Center administration's apparent lack of interest in student opinion's as expressed through the Campus Center Board of Governors.

The candy counter is only one of the issues facing the rally, which will be held after a court hearing this morning. Forty students from the University of Massachusetts filed a complaint in Hampshire Superior Court claiming the Board of Trustees has illegally raised dormitory room rents and okayed renovations of the candy counter.

Taggart said he hopes the rally will pull the Student Union Building groups together and help to prevent the administration from taking SUB room space away from the co-ops to give it organizations that are not student-run.

Pot could bring state funds

By JOAN McKENZIE

An Amherst attorney and a college student have devised a plan to improve the economy by imposing a sales tax on marijuana.

Attorney Richard Evans and Brad Gilbert, a senior at Amherst College, began work on the plan last year. The bill was filed on their request in the Massachusetts State Leislature on Dec. 5, by Rep. Andrew H. Card Jr., R-Holbrook.

"The bill attempts to adress the fact that marijuana is a reality that's here to stay. It's here, it's now, it's part of our environment," Evans said.

The proposal would allow anyone to grow and use marijuana and to sell it to anyone over 18.

The major aim of the bill, Evans said, is to raise large sums of revenue by ending the present tax exempt status on marijuana. Evans said that according to the National Institute of Drug Abuse, there is an underground marijuana industry operating which earns a profit of $50 million each year.

"There is a huge gap in the present economy, imposing a sales tax on marijuana would generate millions of dollars into the economy," Evans said.

Evans said the bill sets up a system of regulation control somewhere along the lines of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Commission, but with improvements. The Commission would license commercial marijuana businesses to grow, process, import, distribute and sell marijuana for research.

Evans said the bill's goals are to curb the use and abuse of marijuana,to protect the public health by regulating the quality, potency, and purity by keeping it free of such dangerous chemicals such as P.C.P.; to concentrate available law enforcements on prevention of serious crime; and restore young peoples' respect for law enforcements.

"Young people feel that if we don't enforce the law, why shold they respect it, and the fact is that we don't enforce it. There are only one out of a hundred convictions for marijuana use," Evans said.

Evans said that under the bill, it would still be a crime to operate a car under the influence of marijuana.

According to an interview which appeared in the Quincy Patriot Ledger, Card filed the bill although he does not support it.

"I believe in free petition. If anyone wants to file a bill, I'll put my name on it. I think this one deserves discussion, but I'm not ready to vote for it, that's for sure. It's pretty outrageous" Card was quoted saying.

Taylor ticket sales draw lines

By SAMUEL CHALFEN
Collegian Staff

The coffee shop was not the only area in the Campus Center yesterday filled with bleary, tired-eyed people.

By 8 a.m. there were 121 people in line from the doorway of Union Records Unlimited in the Student Union Building extending down the xeroxed-sign littered hall, to the entrance of the coffee shop, waiting to purchase tickets for the Feb. 19 James Taylor concert.

David Kim, a junior political science and history major sat with his sleeping friend, Rob Winiger, at the head of the line.

"There are lots of doors open in this place," Kim said with a grin. Winiger and Kim camped out in the Cape Cod Lounge until 4 a.m. when they were kicked out by a security guard, he said. They found a door open near the record store and hung out on the floor until 9 a.m.

Carol Thomas, a sophomore math major, said when she arrived at 7 a.m. she was about three quarters of the way down the line next to the early morning pinball players.

"Surprisingly, it hasn't bothered me," she said of the long wait. "I am surprised (the concert) is this expensive," she said. Tickets for the Martha's Vineyard songster sold at $10, $10.50 and $11.

"I don't feel too bad about that, (the wait)" Julie Maycock, a freshman journalistic studies major said. "It's something you choose to do.

"Tickets are overpriced," she said, bumming a cigarette.

"It's better than the Whitmore line," Rob Weatherwax, a biochemistry junior said. "It's faster and you get to sit down, but we'll be better prepared next time."

Canadian ballet coming

By LISA LANGONE
Collegian Correspondent

Les Grands Ballets Canadiens, one of Canada's foremost ballet companies, will offer one performance only at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst Fine Arts Center Concert Hall on Sunday at 8 p.m.

Since its founding in 1958 by Ludmilla Chiriaff, Les Grands Ballets Canadiens has created a repertoire flowing in contrasts which has appealed to a broad public. Much of the company's efforts have gone into the creation of original Canadian works. Brian MacDonald, recipient of the International Dance Festival Gold Star Award, is the troupe's current artistic director. Fernand Nault, the company's resident choreographer, has created such ballets as "Tommy" and "Carmina Burana."

At Sunday's concert, the following works will be presented: "Capriccio," by George Balanchine to the music of Igor Stravinsky; "After Eden," choreographed by John Butler to the music of Lee Holby; "Aureole," by Paul Taylor to music of Handel; and "Hangman's Reel," by Brian MacDonald to traditional music collected by Quebec fiddler Jean Carignan.

Tickets are now on sale at the Fine Arts Center Box Office, open Mondays through Fridays between noon and 4 p.m. as well as one hour before performances. Ticket prices are $8, $7 and $6 for the general public and $7, $6 and $5 for senior citizens. UMass students are eligible for half-price tickets at $4, $3.50 and $3. For further information and reservations, call the Box Office at 545-2511.

The Iliad without words

By ROB HUFFMAN
Collegian Staff

Homer's Iliad, with a unique twist, will be performed by the National Theatre of the Deaf of Tuesday, February 10 at 8 p.m. in the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall.

"The Iliad, Play by Play" was written by deaf playwright Shanny Mow, and presents the heroic myth as a modern-day football game. "Mean Joe Achilles" and the other Trojans make their plays in accordance with the game plan of the gods, poking fun at superheroes—both classical and contemporary.

The National Theatre of the Deaf, which in 1977 won a Tony Award for "conspicuous achievement in American theater," emphasizes gesture in their performances, though the words will be spoken by an interpreter. According to founder David Hays, "With signing, every part of the body works to inflect color, to tilt the words toward full emotional meaning."

This original production will be offered in conjunction with "Handicap Awareness Day," sponsored by the Office of Handicapped Student Affairs. Paul Appleby, director of this office describes the goal of this day as: "First, to provide information for people—to give them a sense of what it's like to be handicapped in a school or community so they can react and respond to the disabled student. And second, to acquaint handicapped students themselves with all the services available on campus so they can make greater use of them.

In addition to films, demonstrations, and exhibits presented by the Office of Handicapped Student Affairs, the National Theatre of the Deaf will be giving a workshop at 3:30 p.m., and an offshoot of this company, the Little Theatre of the Deaf will offer a special morning performance for area school children.

Tickets for "The Iliad, Play by Play" are available at the FAC box office; UMass students are eligible for half-price tickets.

Carol Lee Aquiline is supported by the National Theatre of the Deaf company in "The Iliad, Play by Play", which will be at the FAC next week.

Amherst police net Florida fugitive

Amherst police arrested a man wanted in Florida for murder yesterday and charged him with being a fugitive from justice.

Francisco Romero, 32, has been wanted by the Hollywood, Florida police on charges of murder, robbery, kidnapping, burglary and grand theft stemming from a Sept. 9, 1980 incident, police said.

Romero was arrested at his 29 Riverglade Apartments home at 3 p.m. by Amherst police detectives John Burns and Steven Zahn. He is being held without bail at the Amherst police station.

Florida police are expected in Northampton today for Romero's arraignment in Hampshire District Court.

Implied Fear

In their last regularly scheduled meeting before the Board of Regents assume power on March 1, under the state's new higher education reorganization legislation, the UMass Board of Trustees voted in favor of creating a doctoral program in environmental studies at the UMass-Boston campus.

The Trustees based their decision on the reasoning that Boston would benefit from the availability of the program, as it would be unique to the area. Opponents to placing the program in Boston, rather than at the Amherst campus, argued that since UMass/Amherst already has a strong undergraduate curriculum in environmental studies, it would make more sense to place the PhD program here.

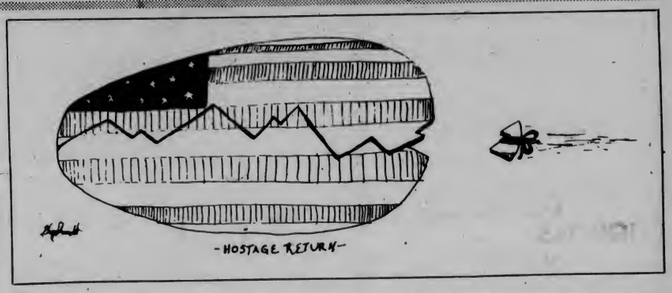
Underlying this debate is the crucial issue of what will be the fate of the University under the auspices of the Board of Regents; the Trustees' vote was interpreted by many to be a transition vote in line with anticipated academic program placement and funding policies of the reorganization soon to come.

There has been broad speculation on what reorganization under the regents will mean for the University. The Trustees' approval of establishing the PhD program appears to conform to the fears of many University faculty, students and administrators that, under reorganization, professional University programs will be dismantled and relocated at the Boston campus, leaving the University to the role of providing undergraduate training.

Actually, the environmental studies PhD program is specifically concerned with marine biology, so it makes sense for it to be located closer to the coast than Amherst. Also, the Trustees indicated their intention to consider such a program over three years ago, before present reorganization legislation had been written.

To the question of whether the Boston campus will be preferred by the Regents for the creating of other new doctoral programs, and relocating those now in Amherst, it seems unlikely that the new board will see any wisdom in dismantling the 80-odd professional programs that have developed here over the past 100 years, to meet the educational needs of the state, and move them to a campus that lacks the physical facility to support them; when, in a period of declining undergraduate enrollments, it can be predicted that there would not be enough students to make use of existing facilities at the University.

Concern over the implications of this move by the Trustees for the University seems unfounded. But there are other questions regarding the future of the University under reorganization which deserve greater attention, and which remain unanswered.



Letters

Aid for El Salvador junta a mistake

Editor's note: the following is a copy of a letter written by Campus Chaplain F. Peter Sabey to President Reagan.

Among the multitude of perplexing issues facing you there is one that is genuinely uncomplicated. Among all the Catholic clergy, nuns, Protestant Seminarians, and agricultural experts whom I know who have direct knowledge of El Salvador, there is not one who believes that the present junta has the interests of the Salvadorean populace at heart, nor is there one who believes that the revolution is communist-led nor seriously Marxist in ideology. It has much more to do with the Magnificat (Luke 1: 50-53).

Former President Carter's decision to resume economic and military aid is a grievous mistake, not only humanely but from the standpoint of America's long-term self-interest in Latin America. Our interests lie with the people of Nicaragua, El Salvador, Honduras, and on and on, not with the military dictatorships that seek to continue the enslavement of the majority. Please seek out wise, first-hand counsel on El Salvador and lead us toward a wise and decent restraint.

F. Peter Sabey
Campus Chaplain

Vietnamization of Latin America

With all the problems we face in our local communities today, it is sometimes difficult to pay attention to a far-away problem or to see how it affects our lives. I write to let our community know about the situation in El Salvador, and to point out why we should urge our government to cease its support of its right-wing military government.

The repression by the junta in the past year has been increasingly brutal, mounting to 9,000 civilian deaths by the military. During that time, the U.S. has supplied millions of dollars' worth of military equipment.

Recently there has been another surge of assassinations, including some of United States citizens. In spite of this obvious and immoral repression, the Carter administration continued to send $40 million in aid to the Land Redistribution Policy, the junta's attempt to militarize and pacify the peasants in the countryside. This is, according to Phillip Wheaton in his pamphlet "Agrarian Reform in El Salvador: The Vietnam Model." One of the key advisors in the Vietnamese land reform and "rural pacification" was Dr. Roy Prosterman, now the chief advisor to the El Salvador junta. Thus, while $5 million in "military aid" has been suspended, $40 million covertly continues the extreme situation.

Moral outrage alone would require us to protest our government's supporting such a brutal regime, but there is more. The election of Ronald Reagan has been widely interpreted as a signal for right-wing dictatorships in Latin America to step up their attacks on all opposition. Their assumption, based on Reagan's own policy statements, is that the President will back them up with the necessary resources to eliminate all opposition. Many news commentators point out that this could well lead to the "Vietnamization of Latin America," an observation also made by Mexico's President Jose Lopez Portillo. Such a turn of events would mean that once again U.S. soldiers would be thrown into battle defending a government that stands against everything U.S. working people have always stood for. Whether or not our own troops are used, further U.S. intervention on behalf of the Salvadorean dictatorship would mean even more money for arms and violence and less money to take care of our burning social needs, such as health care and education.

The crisis in El Salvador is thus a crisis for us all. I urge community members to write or telegram Senators Kennedy and Tsongas (Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C. 20510) protesting U.S. support for the Salvadorean dictatorship. Let's stand up for our treasured values of democracy and human rights!

Jury deliberates on Garwood case

By PETER ARNETT
AP Special Correspondent

CAMP LEJEUNE, N.C. — A five-member jury of Marine officers began deliberations yesterday in the court-martial of Marine Pfc. Robert Garwood, who is accused of collaborating with his captors during almost 14 years he spent in Vietnam.

Garwood, 34, described by one former prisoner of war as a "white Vietnamese," also was charged with maltreating a POW for having him in the cage after a group of fellow inmates killed the prison camp's pet ox for food.

Conviction on either charge carries a maximum sentence of life imprisonment and forfeiture of all accumulated $47,548 in pay that accrued during Garwood's captivity.

The jurors, all Vietnam veterans, also have the option of reducing the maltreatment charge to assault, which carries a maximum penalty of six months in prison.

The jury, which began deliberations at about 9:30 a.m., returned to the courtroom at mid-afternoon and asked to review the testimony of two witnesses, former prisoner Sgt. Billy Watkins and Air Force Col. (ret.) T. T. Carnahan, a forensic psychiatrist who evaluated Garwood.

Watkins said that on the day being taken to a prison camp, "Pfc. Garwood and our guards, they shook hands and embraced." He said Garwood told him to obey the rules of the camp, encouraged him to write statements professing the war and advised him that he would be released if he worked hard.

Watkins said that on one occasion Garwood told another prisoner he did not believe he would ever return to the United States.

The jury was also read testimony from the afternoon of July 26, when Carnahan was asked if Garwood realized he was encouraging fellow POWs.

Marine PFC. Robert Garwood leaves a Lejeune, N.C. courthouse with friend D.J. Lang.

University came into the Bouout the most favorable opening a 15-0 (80-34) record. They were matched against the Harvard-Crimson and the Bees, including all-Gallery finds past performers, anticipated to see added shootout.

The Bouout is penchant for upsets is well known and a one-sided affair was seen, as Harvard's hoop. They stunned NU 89-6. The second game was more predictable with BC playing their home disciplined, shocking game downing Dick Fetter's BC Nomads 5-0 to propel the Eagles into next week's championship final. It was good all-around hockey and a thoroughly enjoyable first round.

The Bouout hockey has been around for thirty years and will be around for the league it's continues to turn out the same brand of competition. The ——Classic (who knows who will sponsor it next year) is destined to hold its records to duplicate last weekend's action in future years.

Matmen crush UNH

By DOUGLAS SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

DURHAM, N.H. — "Three guys have had to fork an elk," said the University of New Hampshire school newspaper reporter. "They've had three major injuries, two guys are wrestling above their weight class and their record is 9-0."

And the bad luck continued. As expected the University of Massachusetts wrestling team left UNH after handing the Wildcats their number-12, and bringing their own record to 8-3-0. The matmen lost just one match of ten yesterday. Dave Sollela, two pins and two superior decisions contributed to the 40-9 ago-lawdel.

167 pound co-captain Charles Rangilone racked up takedowns and near-falls like they were going out of style en route to his 20-2 Dave Brophy trouncing. Brophy who was wrestling a piece of injured starter Randy Pringle, had all he could do to stay off his back as Rangilone worked him and nearly pinned him on more than one occasion. Rangilone was wrestling in his fourth match of the season after coming back from two consecutive injuries.

183 pound Dave McEntee clashed up one number size, clobbering Dan Schwab into way wrestling above his weight class) 22-4. McEntee, who has wrestled in all but one of UMass' 12 meets, now has a 9-3 personal record. Schwab, like Brophy, managed to keep his back off the mat, and concentrated all his efforts on doing just that.

The meet ended without UNH's having put their two premier wrestlers on the mat. 134 pound Dave Vaz (8-1-1 this season) and heavyweight Joe La Caste (8 pins last season, out with non-injury this year). The only win for the Wildcats yesterday was Kurt Mussey in the 142 pound class who lofted his unconscious win over Doug Johnson.

158 pound Mike Mlynowski brought his record to 11-1 with a 9-4 decision yesterday and 190 pound Bill McQuaide was the final winner for the Minutemen.

118 pound freshman Noel Pastore had his first varsity start earlier when UMB forfeited that class. Also winning by forfeit were Kevin Murphy and John Allen.

Tony Jenkins lays the ball in over UP guard Wendy Ingles in the second half. Jenkins scored 20 points in the Minutewomen's 89-56 win over the Wildcats.

GW makes it 7 in a row

By KEVIN COGAN
Collegian Staff

I've had to wonder just how many people were in their favorite local watering hole last night watching the Celtics lose to Philly, instead of at the Cage watching the University of Massachusetts drop its seventh straight basketball game, this one to George Washington, 67-60.

While those in the barrooms had something to drown their sorrows in, the 200 or so who showed up last night suffered attendance hell a la 1981: snagged half with the thought of a cold walk home in freezing temperatures.

Not quite simply, UMass did not deserve to win last night. The Minutemen (4-16) shot a miserable 8-for-35 (50 percent) from the floor during the first half as GW built up a 38-31 halftime lead. UMass came out with a more aggressive defense in the second half and shot a bit better (40 percent), and a last minute run closed the final gap to seven points in what was clearly not a score point game.

UMass head coach Ray Wilsey pulled no punches after his head after his team had dropped their sixth Eastern Eight game this season.

"I take as much blame for the loss as the kids," Wilsey said. "I kept them in the zone too long. We should have gone to man-to-man (defense) earlier."

The source of it all in that last night was a woeful performance for UMass. The Colonials (7-13) came into the game minus their two best guards, leading scorer Wilbert Culpepper (shoulder) and senior Curtis Jeffries (?).

"We were hurting on our ball handling without our starting guards," said GW head coach Bob Tallent, "we hustled and rebounded well. Anytime you win on the road, you've got to be happy. And this was our first win on the road this year."

Tallent had a point with the rebounding. GW, led by Steve Perry's 13, outrebounded UMass 50-39. Colonial center Paul Cronin had seven rebounds to go along with four blocks.

For UMass, freshman Craig Smith led with 16 points while Edwin Green had 13 and Bill Hayes added 11, but with seven rebounds.

Colonial guard Sandy Davis paced the winners with 17, while sophomore forward Victor Wilmington added 14.

Two tourneys, different stories

Two past weekend, two major track, at least one of their could qualify as major college sports tournaments were held at the venerable Boston Garden. The President Classic basketball was played Friday night and Saturday night and the Bouquet hockey tournament held its first round of play Monday evening in the Causeway St. sports shrine.

The Colonial Provident Company, which sponsored the hoop classic from its inception in 1976 until this year, when Provident Savings took over, must have seen the writing on the wall when they dropped out. Earlier three years of the Colonial Classic were, quite simply, fun to watch. The matchups were mixed: "classic" ones between some New England teams that were fairly evenly balanced talent-wise. Last year, however, the tournament began to show signs of wear. The games were one-sided and penny-saving. This year's President Classic carried these negative traits to an extreme. The weekend's action presented, in many ways, to an extreme a exceedingly dismal ...

Stephen Parker

"In the opening game, the UMass Minutemen never got closer than 19 points to a Holy Cross team that wasn't even close to the Boston Party-guided teams of the '70s. When Perry played in this tournament, he alone accounted for four or six thousand paying customers. It was actually tough to get a ticket to the Colonial Classic in those days.

The second game, supposedly the "highlight" game of the tourney, was not much better than. It was a two-point game up until the last minute of play, with Boston College hanging on for the win over Rick Pitino's young Boston University contingent, but it was certainly not exciting basketball. BC in most games a flashy, offensive minded squad, stuck faithfully to coach Tom Davis' slow-down, grave plan rushes with bonus passes, good fundamentally, but far from crowd-pleasing basketball.

The finale were played Saturday and the same was no different, as, once through the minister again as ready to the championship victory over Holy Cross and BC wiped out the Minutemen 61-42 in a game in which Pitino was decried as behaving in a manner unbecoming a head coach.

Court investigates candy counter suit

By DOROTHY CHALIFOUX

NORTHAMPTON — A justice ordered an agent of the court to seek out some information regarding a case brought by Holy University of Massachusetts students against the UMass Board of Trustees.

The students claimed the board illegally raised residence hall rates and approved allocations for renovations of the Student Union Building Complex. The complaint was filed in Hampshire County Superior Court in Northampton on Jan. 19. The case will be continued on next Tuesday in Northampton.

Justice Raymond E. Cross appointed attorney Wade Lenart of Springfield as Justice's Master for fact finding.

The complaint specified an increase in residence hall rates and an allocation over $2,000 could be made without approval of the UMass Building Authority.

The basis for the charge is that Accountants called the Management and Services Agreements that were drawn up for each of the residence halls and the Campus Center when the projects were begun.

Attorney Michael Fili of the Legal Services office told Justice Cross the students could not file funding for maintenance and repair of the projects was properly done. During students, the Commonwealth and taxpayers to pick up the tab.

University attorney Sidney Myers, representing the Board told the court, "I think this case has been extensively brought, unjustifiably, that is."

The Board of Trustees approved residence hall rate increases from a range of $914 to $974 to a range of $1004 to $1105, depending on the room size, on Dec. 5, 1980.

The trustees approved the yearly contract renovations to a contract signed Sept. 30, 1980 for the sum of $47,305.

Campus Center Director William Harris said the construction should be finished by mid-February.

Reagan says cuts necessary

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Reagan, declaring that the nation is suffering from its "worst economic mess since the Great Depression," said last night that the government must make dramatic cuts in taxes and spending because the economic judgment day is at hand.

He told government policies responsible for the situation and said his remedy would begin with three years of 10 percent cuts in income tax rates and spending reductions "in virtually every department" of government.

"Over the years, we have let negative economic forces run out of control," Reagan said in his first nationally broadcast report to the nation. "We have stalled the judgment day. We no longer have that luxury. We are out of time."

He said: "A few days ago, I was presented with a report had asked for — a comprehensive audit, if you will, of our economic condition. You won't like it, I didn't like it, but we have to face the truth and then go to work to turn things around.

"And make no mistake about it," he added, "We can turn them around."

Reagan's address was studded with statistics, but short of details. He said those will come when he unveils a legislative program to Congress on Feb. 18.

"It will propose budget cuts in virtually every department of government," the president said. Moreover, Reagan said his Cabinet will search out "waste, extravagance and costly administrative overhead" to produce additional reductions.

"At the same time we are doing this, we must go forward with a tax relief package," he said. "I shall ask for a 10 percent reduction, across-the-board, in personal income tax rates for each of the next three years." He did not say when the tax cut would first take effect under his plan.

Garwood found guilty of collaboration

By PETER ARNETT
AP Special Correspondent

CAMP LEJEUNE, N.C. — A five-man military jury yesterday convicted Marine Pfc. Robert Garwood of collaborating with the enemy during the nearly 14 years he spent as a prisoner of war in Vietnam. It was the first court-martial of a Vietnam-era POW.

The jury found the 34-year-old Garwood — described by one former POW as a "White Vietnamese" — innocent on a charge of maltreating a fellow POW but convicted him on a lesser charge of assaulting the POW. All the jurors are Vietnam veterans.

The verdict, which found Garwood guilty on all five accusations in the collaboration charge, came during the jury's second day of deliberations and after they examined copies of testimony given by some of the government's most damaging witnesses.

Sentencing will be determined by the same jury after further hearings. The collaboration verdict carries a possible maximum sentence of life in prison.

Garwood, an Indiana native who returned voluntarily to the United States in late 1979, looked straight ahead as the verdict was read, seemingly impassive as he had been during the 12-week-long trial. As he sat down, however, he seemed to be blinking back tears.

His companion of the past 18 months, Diana Lang, a widow in whose house Garwood resides, wept openly but made no comment.

The defense team, headed by John C. Lowe, appeared shocked and offered no comment as they left the court with Garwood. The tense scene was a dramatic contrast to the hallway outside the courtroom a few minutes earlier, where counsel and reporters joked about casting the "Robert Garwood Story" for the movies.

A few minutes later, at 4:32 p.m., a Marine guard ran from his post at the court door to announce that the verdict was coming.

Journalist in Iran denies spy charges

Associated Press

American writer Cynthia B. Dwyer denied spy charges at her trial by an Iranian Revolutionary Court and the prosecutor said she was drawn into a fictitious plot to free the 52 American hostages, an Iranian newspaper said yesterday.

A report in the newspaper Ettelat on her Wednesday trial said the prosecutor indicated the 49-year-old mother of three had been tricked by two Revolutionary Guards who made up a story about an armed band of students who wanted to free the American hostages.

According to the newspaper's fragmentary report, the prosecutor said Mrs. Dwyer agreed to help and tried to obtain guns and radio equipment to aid the plan to free the hostages.

Mrs. Dwyer was arrested May 5 after she went to Iran to write articles about the Iranian revolution. The Swiss Embassy, which represents U.S. interests in Iran, said Wednesday she had been tried on espionage charges at a one-day session of a Revolutionary Court and that a verdict was expected in the next few days.

National sit-in strike called for in Poland

WARSAW, Poland (AP) — Independent labor leader Lech Walesa called yesterday for a general sit-in strike throughout Poland if the government cracks down on strikers in the Bielsko Biala region and disrupts communications among union chapters.

In Jelenia Gora, union officials said the strike committee proclaimed a general warning strike in that city starting Feb. 9 if the government fails to meet previous demands and ensure full pay for strikers. The strikers say they were promised full pay in last August's settlement.

The threat of new strikes came after talks between strike leaders and government commissions broke down in both cities.

The Feb. 9 strike deadline coincides with the start of a session of the Communist Party's Central Committee, widely expected to deal with the labor conflict that has badly hurt Poland's shaky economy.

State conducts hearing on coyote hunting law

A proposed hunting season on the eastern coyote, protected from hunting since it first appeared in Western Massachusetts nearly 30 years ago, was the subject of a hearing by state wildlife officials in Holdsworth Hall last night.

Many farmers, who testified in favor of the season, claim the animal is killing off increasing numbers of livestock in New England. About 150 people attended the hearing.

Of the thirteen people who spoke during the hearing, nine were in favor of the proposed season, which would run from Nov. 1 to the end of February.

Many of those nine suggested extending the season and that water set trapping be allowed. An animal caught in such a trap would be drawn along a wire leading to a pool of water where the animal would drown.

The hearing was the first of two to be conducted by the Division of Fisheries and Game. After holding its second hearing Feb. 12 in Weston, the seven-member board of directors of the division will make its final decision on the hunting season, said director Richard Cronin. He said he expects the decision to be made sometime in April.

Cronin called the animal "one of the most controversial animals in North America."

Douglas Kimball of Springfield spoke against the proposal calling the coyote one of the few natural predators left.

"We've wiped out most of the others. The coyote is not big on killing livestock. It's only a small group that does."

But Chet Mccord, chief of wildlife research for the division, said attempts to study the animal are ineffective and expensive.

'Bad Air' looms at UM

By KATHLEEN HOWLEY

Office workers, professors and lab technicians in the Graduate Research Towers say "indoor air pollution" is still a major concern of theirs, two years after the towers were temporarily closed for an investigation into the ventilation system.

According to Arthur Clifford of the University News Bureau conditions in the Graduate Research Center and some other campus buildings are still under investigation.

Robert Plourde, a research assistant in the Biochemistry department, said some of his co-workers in Graduate Research Towers have complained of headaches and drowsiness.

"The ventilation systems in the labs are sometimes ineffective," he said, "so if someone is working with toxic chemicals the other workers aren't receiving adequate protection."

Donald Robinson, staff administrator at University Health Services, said ventilation problems at UMass are not due to faulty building design.

"Sometimes we have a problem with the cold air which causes the controls to malfunction," he said, "but (toxins) are not at measurable levels in the building."

Robinson said part of the problem is due to faulty work practices, such as not using the protective suction hoods when working with chemicals.

Plourde disagrees.

"The hoods are ineffective," he said. "They don't create enought vacuum to keep the chemicals out of the air."

Plourde is concerned that the problem might also be affecting air quality outside the building.

"Last semester I was walking about 50 feet from the building and I could smell organic solvents in the air," he said.

Prop. 2½ proposed budget cuts upset local school

By RON MILLER
Collegian Staff

SOUTH DEERFIELD—Classes resumed as usual yesterday at the Frontier Regional School following a walk-out Wednesday by students protesting proposed budget cuts under Proposition 2½.

According to Lisa Rigoletti, 17, a senior at the school, the idea for a protest began last week. Students on the wrestling team were upset because the School Committee had cut $293,000 out of the school's $1.4 million budget and funding for the team was eliminated. Students were also upset because the budget committee meeting was held without their being notified.

She said students were not told when the meeting was, nor were they asked what they thought should be cut. Not even the parents were informed, she said.

At 8:30 Wednesday morning approximately 350 out of 550 students walked out of school when the bell for first period rang. Rigoletti said their goal was to attract the media. When they walked out they were greeted by reporters from Channels 40 and 22, as well as newspaper and radio reporters.

They walked to the front of the school where they listened to six students speaking on the budget cuts, who urged them to write their congress representatives, state reps, and Gov. Edward J. King.

After they listened to speakers they took a 15 minute walk to the Town Hall where they chanted slogans like, "Stop the Prop," and sang their Alma Mater. Some students carried signs. Rigoletti said they were then mislead by a policeman to return to school, which they did.

She said the principal had met with the students Monday afternoon to discuss the walkout. She said he encouraged them not to walk out, that it was gone, and it would show how behind the times their school was.

She said that most of the teachers supported them and that some teachers came out and listened to the speakers.

At 10 a.m. the students went back inside and classes resumed normally for the rest of the day.

"Everything was really organized and everyone cooperated," she said.

Rigoletti said she'd heard yesterday it was announced the cuts were going to amount to $300,000 instead of the announced $293,000, but Superintendent Alfred Laurie denied it. "It's like a ghost joke. I don't know what's going to be done. I mean there's going to be no money," she said.

Massive layoffs could result from Prop. 2½ taxcuts

Associated Press

BOSTON — Wholesale layoffs of police officers, firefighters and teachers will result from tax-cutting Proposition 2½ unless the state substantially increases aid to municipalities, local officials and union leaders warned a legislative committee yesterday.

Even Barbara Anderson, director of the group that sponsored 2½, Citizens for Limited Taxation, joined in the call before the Taxation Committee for increased state aid to cities and towns.

[illegible] city officials and union leaders packed [illegible] with Mrs. Anderson over the issue of whether school [illegible] should be increased to help municipalities replace the estimated $600 million they will lose because of property tax reductions [illegible].

Mrs. Anderson opposed any increases in state taxes, while union leaders and many local officials said the [illegible] would be needed to aid cities.

Mayors and legislators dominated the hearing which packed [illegible] Auditorium in the Statehouse.

AFL-CIO [illegible] and the municipal workers union [illegible] two hotels, state and the municipal workers union [illegible] members of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, waged a joint, walkout. The Rep. Richard T. Moore, D-Uxbridge, during a public hearing yesterday at the golden [illegible] committee's House chairman, Democrat Rep. Harold [illegible], told said, however, that the committee would [illegible] to receive proof all witnesses had a chance to speak. The committee plans to hold other hearings throughout the state next month.

Approved by the voters last November, Proposition 2½ limits property tax collections to no more than 2½ percent of the full market value of the property in a city or town.

auditorium yesterday in the state house.

Charles Mayer, chief Republican, who supported 2½ last year, said he would be forced to lay police officers, fire fighters and teachers unless the state provides more aid.

Democrats said while Gov. Edward King has advocated local officials of school funding by decreasing police and fire layoffs, those departments make up such a high percentage of municipal budgets the savings are inevitable without massive layoffs.

JOHN MORRELL DIDN'T BECOME A TRAINEE AFTER COLLEGE. HE BECAME A MANAGER.

"As Executive Officer of the Army's Defense Language Institute at Monterey, California, I'm responsible for the housing, feeding and well-being of 300 students. And that's no small task. I manage an annual food budget of over a million and a half dollars. And I'm accountable for five million dollars worth of property.

"On top of managing money, I also supervise a staff of 24 people. And each one has a unique problems that I have to handle on a daily basis. You better believe the leadership and management training I received in Army ROTC is paying off.

There are other good reasons for taking ROTC, too. Like after-graduation opportunities. And financial assistance – up to $1,000 a year for your last two years of ROTC.

If you want a job after college that offers real challenge and real responsibility, do what John Morrell did. Take Army ROTC.

And begin your future as an officer.

An ember flickers

A fire began to blaze brightly last semester. Gently prodded by sparks of enthusiasm, the black community joined hands and stood unified for Black Homecoming. Each night, the blze grew a little stronger, enticing those leery bystanders to its warmth.

The community generated a sense of satisfaction and happiness as it stood as one. It verbally and thoughtfully expressed its love for its members.

It's February now, one of the coldest months of a New England winter. It is Black History Month a time for celebration, appreciation and understanding of our culture, leaders and accomplishments. It is my hope that somewhere within this blustery month, the community will once again spark that magical fire of unity. The ember grows brightly, waiting for the human touch to unlease its heart-warming warmth.

Across the nation, the same fire is gently fanned. The community joined hands and marched in unison to honor Martin Luther King. The photos reminded me of the Black Homecoming Parade multiplied by the thousands. Those faces were ours, generating a deep inside warmth even to those who could only attend via the television.

The community has sparked a wonderful blaze. Unattached it will flicker and turn into dust. Let not the accomplishments and lives of our people go unrecognized and without celebration. Let us join hands and gently fan the blaze and basked in the warmth of the fire.

Bofill to appear in Bowker

Artista/GRP Records recording artist Angela Bofill will perform on Friday, Feb. 20th at 8 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium. Jazz Vocalist Bofill captured music critics with the release of her first album Angie in November, 1978. Bofill moved quickly in the jazz arena. Cash Box named her #1 Top New Jazz Artist and #5 Top New Female Vocalist-Pop LPs, six weeks after the release of her first album.

The Chicago Tribune said "...Bofill, like Billie Holiday is a true vocal/focal point and because of her, its a musically stimulating, highly visual act."

The 25 year-old jazz vocalist has toured with jazz greats Stan Getz, Dizzy Gillespie, and Al Jarreau. Hailing from the West Bronx, Bofill started her musical career at four-years-old. Encouraged by her tenor-voiced father, she began to compose songs at twelve. Bofill formed a band in high school jokingly called the Puerto Rican Supremes. The Bronx Native was the lead soloist with New York's Dance Theatre of Harlem Chorus, for which she also arranged, composed and conducted.

Critic Bruce Carlos wrote "There is no doubt that Ms. Angela Bofill will spread her wings, her song and soar with potencia."

Don't miss this rising jazz vocalist on Feb. 20th. For ticket information contact UPC.

Town Planning Board eyes zoning amendment

By TIMOTHY J. FOWLER
Collegian Staff

The Amherst Planning Board is conducting a feasibility study on a zoning amendment which would increase the number of apartment units allowed in a single family house.

The Board met Wednesday night to determine the number of houses in town eligible for conversion to multi-residence dwellings in an effort to aid the study being conducted by the town planner.

The present law permits a single-family house to be converted to up to four apartments.

Frederick G. Rice, a planning board member, said "the board has determined that "an owner must have 12,000 square feet to convert to one apartment and 2500 square feet for each additional apartment unit."

Rice came at the last town meeting said Rice, when a motion to change the by-laws was proposed.

"The motion was voted down when it was decided that a study should first be done by the town, and that's why we were working on it Wednesday night," said Rice.

In other action, the board discussed allowing row houses, also known as town houses, in residential districts. Rice said this issue would be one of the major concerns at the spring town meeting, and that the board had discussed it many times before.

The board members also listened to a University of Massachusetts student intern who is conducting a report on the Amherst housing situation.

Rice said, "The town's housing report is very important for the board. It states the history and demand of housing in Amherst, especially in relation to the University, which is slowly gaining more part-time students who live outside of the on-campus housing areas."

Rice said these issues and others will be discussed at a public hearing on March 26.

Merger prompts Senate meeting

The speaker of the Undergraduate Student Senate has called a special senate meeting for Monday night to discuss the proposed merger between the University of Massachusetts Boston campus and Boston State University.

Student Senate

This semester's first regularly scheduled meeting of the senate will be Wednesday night.

Student Speaker Linda Casey said it is important for students to be aware of the proposed merger, which would remove the Boston campus from the Five-campus UMass system.

Casey said Student Government Association vice-President Richard Wates said students should take a stand on the issue before a Board of Regents task force on the merger meets in Boston Tuesday.

"To the merger is a pressing matter," said Casey. "It warrants a separate meeting."

The proposed merger and the possibility of separating the Boston and Amherst campuses has sparked controversy among UMass administrators, faculty and students on both campuses.

The real world in Disneyland

Steve Masse

So the vacation's over. I knew it had to happen, and toward the end I was actually looking forward to it. There comes a time when even the vacation needs a break. That's why they made schools, to break up the monotony of vacations.

[illegible] in such a school, a kindly outpost of intellectual refinement in an otherwise hostile "real world." The question [illegible] around the community showing the "real world" that we still run it order.

The other day I was contemplating the lack of "real world" influence in our environment. This could brought on some curious conclusions. You see, I have been an active participant in both the college world and the "real world." Sometimes both at the same time. I've also been an active participant in the library world.

The library world is a place where things go well in the end. It's a world of rules and decorum, pretty routine and sending patrons and processors, while human that don't obey. While we're enthusiast workers, you could be a fine detective [illegible] every a year. There is no pressure. Yet, despite the goodness of this world, it is still a sanitized place. And as I mentioned, even the vacation needs a break after a while.

You are then left with that empty term called "facing reality." It is where you have to buy books with money you'd rather spend on something else. Where your boyfriend treats you with less consideration than you deserve. Where your daily responsibilities don't stop demanding great things of you even though you may be sick or deeply depressed.

Then there's another kind of "facing reality." We realize that hopes and dreams keep the world turning, and that dreams are good as long as we don't let them control our dealings with actual people and actual situations. But what about when horrible things happen? You know, things that challenge us, that shatter the basic tenets of all our hopes and dreams?

Take John Lennon's murder, for instance. Horrors are a part of our basic fabrics, they don't die—they live on. But how do we delude ourselves into thinking the murder could ever fit into the library world that has become so much a part of our enjoy? We don't. We're sheltered. That is "facing reality."

But to be more positive, another reality is growth. We put ourselves in an educational situation for growth. While we are ready to graduate, we seek more growth. Somehow college stimulates growth in ways that the working world can not. This is a reality, too. What else is there to life if all one does is exist, survive? One must attain higher things to make it all worthwhile. So whenever somebody complains that college is not the real world, tell them they're mistaken.

College is so much a part of the real world that it gives people shows, headaches, gall, sorrows, strain. It makes people laugh, cry, learn to live among each other. College people eat, sleep, are in the bathroom, work, study, think, dream—just like "real" people do. Statistics, we're all in the same boat. Whoa, we're in the Titanic—just shut up and keep swimming.)

If money is the main difference between the college world and the "real world," then perhaps the "real world" ought to be called the "business world." At least that would be putting the thing into perspective. The business world has a 9-5 treadmill-like mentality, but college is just as real and just as important.

Letters

Please, Save UMass

Editor's note: the following is a copy of a letter written to Gov. Edward J. King.

I feel that I must write you this letter to express my deep concern regarding the condition of public higher education in the state, in particular the University of Massachusetts at Amherst.

I am a New York resident and an accounting major in my junior year at UMass. I am a resident assistant in Wash Washburn High and graduate of the Orchard Hill Residence Area Government. I joined UMass for my undergraduate studies because of its fine academic reputation. In New York, and in other states besides Massachusetts, UMass enjoys the status of having ranked among many of the top colleges in the country. However, since the start of my studies at the University in Sept. of 1978, I have seen the school deteriorate in almost every respect.

In a quite obvious to the UMass community that the political officials running Massachusetts and the Board of Public Higher Education do not place education as one of their top priorities. I feel that education should be given primary importance. UMass, with its fine facilities and prominent faculty, offers students with many different aspirations the opportunity of acquiring an excellent education. However, with the continuing budget cuts and administration errors, the University will find it impossible to function at an acceptable level.

There is also another factor that is contributing to the general deterioration of UMass. The law changing the drinking age to 20 years of age has forced many students to drink in their dormitories. They will have the same access to alcohol as they did when the drinking age was 18, but because of this the University has experienced an increase in domestic violations, adding to the "free floor" image. The higher drinking age has also forced many teenagers across Massachusetts to drink in their cars, which, in turn, has increased the drinking and driving problem.

I am asking you and your administration to take a closer more personal look at UMass. The majority of students work hard and have aspirations of attending the graduate schools and gaining good jobs. We do not want to see the reputation of the school destroyed. The fine out-of-state reputation that the University enjoyed when I was a freshman just merely exists. Only you can save the University for all present and future students. I do realize there are many problems when 25,000 people are placed together in any environment, but recovery must start somewhere, and soon. If you really want to help the state, please reconsider your present policies governing public higher education.

Robert Dionaglio

Women's week events scheduled for March

By JOAN McKENZIE
Collegian Staff

The fifth annual International Women's Week at the University of Massachusetts will take place March 4-8. A series of workshops, films, lectures, and entertainment encompassing a wide range of topics will be presented to commemorate the history of the struggle of women throughout the world.

The history of International Women's Week began in 1911, when Clara Zetkin, a women who protested against the unsafe working conditions and poor pay of women in Europe, proposed that March 8 be declared International Women's day in tribute to women's role in the struggle to change society.

The theme of International Women's Week this year is "Women Around the World Changing the World." Its intention, according to Rebecca Dobkins, a members of the workshop committee is to provide a working conference for women of all nations to share struggles, strategies and victories.

The conference is scheduled to begin Wednesday evening, March 4, with an opening panel discussion of national issues and a final discussion of international issues Dobkins said.

On March 5-7 workshops will be conducted all day long. "These workshops will be conducted by a resource people; women who have been involved in struggles. There will be women from the Valley involved, and also women throughout the country," Dobkins said.

The workshops will be designed to address five major issues: liberation, violence, work, "new right," and health care.

Topics to be discussed include: the status of women today in the United State, war implications at home and in third world countries, rape, pornography, battered women, prisons, sexualy harassment, discrimination, family, reproductive freedom, sterilization abuse, and childbirth abuse.

A major area to be discussed during the conference according to Phyllis Rodin, a member of the planning committee, is the "New Right." That is, the recent shift of the government to the right under President Ronald Reagan. "The New Right is going to seriously affect the working status of women and minorities. These are the people who are going to be pushed to the side as the economy worsens. The jobs will go to men," Rodin said.

According to Dobkins the workshops will contain facts and statistics, will attempt to point out how these issues affect women in other countries. The workshops will also discuss the relevance of the issues to lesbians, and single mothers.

In addition to the workshops, the conference will also offer lectures, films, and entertainment. Elli Bagli, a member of the planning committee has organized a group of women to speak throughout the week. These include Lynn Wells, a member of the executive committee of the anti-Klan network in the south; Linda Edwards, a worker at the Amherst Nursing home and a participator during the recent strike; and Gina Harman, founder of Women Organized for Reproductive Choice (WORC).

According to Bagli, the Conference has been assured to receive $5,000 from the Distinguished Visitors Program (DVP).

Advertisement THE GREAT AMERICAN BEER SWITCH Advertisement

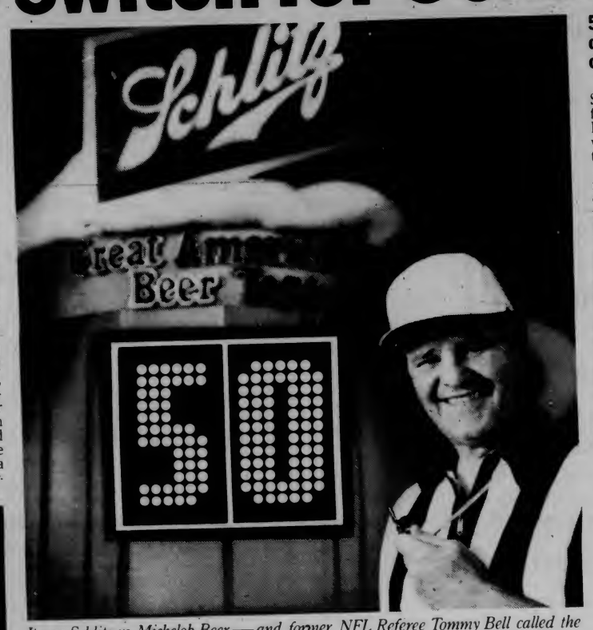
50% of Michelob fans pull the switch for Schlitz

48% of 200 loyal Budweiser drinkers also prefer Schlitz

Schlitz' impressive showing against Michelob wasn't the first time loyal beer drinkers picked Schlitz over their brand. Results were similar in earlier tests against number one selling Budweiser.

In a live TV taste test conducted just before the second half of the Oakland/Houston playoff game, 46 out of 100 loyal Bud drinkers preferred Schlitz over their own beer. A week later, 100 more Bud drinkers were tested. This time 50%—exactly half—pulled the switch for Schlitz.

All in all, 48% of the loyal Bud drinkers tested liked Schlitz better. Prior to the test, the panelists had signed affidavits affirming that Budweiser was their beer. Most of them seemed confident that Bud would be their choice in the test. At least 48% left with a new outlook—and some, perhaps, with a new beer.



It was Schlitz vs. Michelob Beer — and former NFL Referee Tommy Bell called the score for Schlitz in the live TV taste test.

50 out of 100 Michelob drinkers pick Schlitz on live Super Bowl TV

100 million fans watched as Schlitz took on Michelob in the finale of "The Great American Beer Switch." The dramatic test was conducted live during halftime of the Super Bowl game.

The huge audience witnessed 100 loyal Michelob drinkers choose between two unlabelled beers—their own Michelob and today's Schlitz. The outcome proved a surprise to many Michelob drinkers who found themselves preferring the taste of Schlitz over the taste of Michelob.

Each of the 100 loyal Michelob drinkers was served two beers, one Schlitz and one Michelob, in unlabelled ceramic mugs. Tasters were told to indicate a tie, or make a choice by pulling an electronic switch left or right in the direction of the beer they preferred. To insure fairness, the testing was conducted by a leading independent consumer research firm. The results were validated by another top statistical research company, Elrick and Lavidge, Inc.

Before the test, the Michelob drinkers probably thought they would pick their own brand. A lot of them seemed surprised as they watched the number of Michelob drinkers who preferred Schlitz flash up for national TV.

"I was confident" states Schlitz Chief Frank Sellinger

The results of the taste tests were not unexpected for Schlitz Chief Executive, Frank Sellinger.

"Some people thought it was risky to do live TV taste tests in front of millions of people," says Sellinger, "but it didn't take nerve, it just took confidence."

Sellinger, a master brewer for 40 years, has helped brew some of the world's finest beers. Since joining the company three years ago, he has concentrated on making Schlitz the best premium beer on the market.

"They brought me here to brew the best," says Sellinger. "And this Schlitz is it."

It seems quite a few of the Bud, Miller and Michelob drinkers tested agree.

200 Miller drinkers tested: Schlitz is preferred by 37%

In the weeks following the impressive showing against #1 Budweiser, Schlitz went head to head against another leading beer—Miller.

In two taste tests appearing on live television, a total of 200 loyal Miller drinkers were asked to choose between their beer and Schlitz. Again, a significant number of Miller drinkers decided their beer was second best and pulled the switch for Schlitz.

Beer fans surprised at choice of Schlitz

Panelists who decided their beer was second best and chose Schlitz expressed surprise. Similar reactions have been registered in other taste tests across the country.

"I honestly selected the beer I preferred and it wasn't Miller," admitted Miller drinker, Albert Gualano.

"I'm genuinely surprised," exclaimed Guy D'Anne, "I thought Bud was better but I've been proved wrong." "Schlitz has much better flavor than Miller, and it goes down easier," attested Bill Weber, "I could drink it all night."

Panelist Bernie Felsbit summed up the reaction of many of the Bud, Miller and Michelob drinkers when he said, "There may be a new beer in my future."

Loyal Michelob drinkers chose between unlabelled mugs of their Michelob and today's Schlitz.

Do it yourself—try the "Great American Beer Switch" test

This test requires two identical mugs, a Schlitz and your regular beer, at equal temperature. Label the mugs "1" and "2" so the taster won't know which beer is which. Pour the beers to equal heads out of the taster's sight.

To ensure that the choice is made on taste alone, serve the beer in non-transparent mugs or have the taster close his eyes. Now let the taster sample both of the beers and choose the one that tastes better. Now you taste both beers yourself. Did you pick your regular brand? Or today's Schlitz?

Women's Studies program offers variety of opportunities

By LILLIAN SINGER
Collegian Staff

The opportunity to study women's past and present contributions to society is available at the University of Massachusetts through the Women's Studies Department.

According to a pamphlet prepared by the department, the aim of the program is to compensate for our society's neglect in acknowledging the contributions of women to human culture.

Women scholars and students have labored to establish Women's Studies as a national program. There are now more than two hundred Women Studies programs offerred in universities and colleges across the country.

"The program is growing in leaps and bounds," said Judy Lebold of the Women's Studies Union Council. "UMass has been nationally recognized as having one of the most developed programs of its kind."

Just last semester the university accepted Women's Studies as a major with the grant of a BA upon graduation. Thirty six Women's Studies credits including mandatory courses called Foundations in Feminism, Feminist Theory, Methods of Research, Advanced Seminar and a cross-cultural course are required for the major.

As a Women's Studies student, one has the opportunity to design her own plan of study in consultation with a faculty sponsor. The plan of study can be in the general area of Women's Studies, or can focus on a specific area, ranging anywhere from Women in Health Care to Women in American History. In either case, the program is interdisciplinary and is run on a one-to-one basis with a faculty sponsor. The program also offers a wide variety of courses that are open to everyone at the University.

"Women's Studies students are special because they are so interested in each other's work and the faculty appreciates our work as well," said Lebold. "The program also is very special because it really respects the student's voices, hears what we have to say and encourages us to say it."

Serving as a liaison between the faculty members and the students, the program members also sponsor films, forums and other various programs to make the modern woman more aware.

Tomorrow evening the Council will sponsor a concert given by feminist singer/songwriter Holly Near at the Fine Arts Center at 8:00. Proceeds will benefit the National Women's Studies Association.

UM students case pending

The case against two University of Massachusetts students, who placed an advertisement in The Massachusetts Daily Collegian classifieds last November seeking volunteers to help assassinate then President-elect Ronald Reagan, is still pending.

George Kelly, assistant United States attorney, said that no final decision has been made. He said that the decision will have to be made by his superiors.

Thomas Lesser, the Northampton attorney representing the two students, said he is not prepared to talk about the outcome of the case. He said he expects a decision from the U.S. attorney in 10 to 14 days.

Lesser maintained last November that federal laws had not been violated because "the law says it has to be a serious threat."

He said he still feels that the tone of the advertisement indicates that it wasn't a serious threat.

Three days after the election on November 10, the advertisement was placed at the Collegian Business office. The Secret Service, employed to ensure the safety of the President, sent agents to the Collegian office to investigate.

On November 17, Collegian Editor in chief Robert Stein, was served a subpoena by U.S. Attorny George F. Kelly forcing him to hand over the advertising records which revealed the names of the two students.

U. of Puerto Rico dean to talk

The Dean of the Faculty of Humanities from the University of Puerto Rico will be a guest speaker Monday, here at the University of Massachusetts.

Dr. Jose R. De La Torre will visit the campus and lecture on the "Status of the Puerto Rican Novel." The lecture will be given in Spanish and will be held in 227 Herter Hall at 4 p.m. All Spanish speaking persons in the community are welcome. De La Torre will also discuss the ongoing exchange program between the two universities.

ABC anchorman to lecture

Max Robinson, anchorman on ABC's "World News Tonight," will speak at Smith College this Sunday, at 8 p.m. in Wright Hall auditorium.

Robinson has been with ABC since 1978 where, in addition to regularly anchoring "World News Tonight," he has presented special news reports, including coverage of the Three Mile Island crisis. Prior to joing ABC, he was a reporter, studio director, and anchorman at WTOP and WRC in Washington, D.C.

Robinson helped found the Association of Black Journalists. He has won three Emmy Awards, the Capital Press Club Journalist of the Year Award, the Ohio State Award, and an award from the National Education Association.

The lecture is sponsored by Smith's Student Lecture Committee and the Black Students' Alliance and is free and open to the public.

Mural contest gets underway

Local artists have been invited to enter a mural competition conducted by the Murray D. Lincoln Campus Center in association with the University of Massachusetts Division of Auxiliary Services.

The mural must depict UMass in the first decade (1963 to 1973) of its second century and should complement the three historical theme murals of UMass already on display in the Campus Center Commons according to competition officials.

The finished work must be painted, with oil or acrylic, on a single piece of 4 x 16 plywood that is one half inch thick, officials said. The winner will receive a $1,000 stipend and have their work displayed in the lower concourse.

Proposals must be in the form of renderings, to scale, accompanied by a written rationale. An estimate of the materials' cost should also be provided.

Those interested should contact Thad Dabrowski, 545-1365, in room 226A of the Campus Center, before the competition closes April 30.

Summer counselors sought

Applications are now being accepted for student counselor positions in the 1981 Summer New Students' Program. The Program will operate from June 7 through July 24, 1981. Eleven sessions for first-year students will be held, along with four transfer programs.

All positions require residence in an assigned residence hall and meals in the dining commons for the nine-week period. Summer Counseling positions require full-time participation. Summer School courses cannot be taken.

Interested students can apply at the Student Development and Counseling Center, 123 Berkshire House. Applications must be returned to 123 Berkshire on or before February 13. Selections will be announced during Spring break.

Language exams offered

The New Students' Program will administer language advanced placement exams during the first ten class days, now through February 17 at 12:45 p.m. in Room 303, Berkshire House. There is no charge for students entering the University for the first time. There will be a $2 fee for all other students. Students need to present valid identification. Call 545-0333 for more information.

Hillel offers free programs

Hillel, the University Jewish student organization here, is having a brunch on Sunday Feb. 8 at 11 a.m. (free) and a program at 11:45 a.m. (free).

The topic is "The Jewish Community of France" with Fred Rosi and Beatrice Braude.

Rally opposes candy counter

Nearly twenty people attended a rally held to discuss the construction of a controversial new candy counter in the Student Union Building yesterday.

Co-op Collective Chairman Peter Taggart, organizer of the meeting, said he had expected more energy and more people to be at the meeting but that they were able to get the facts out to some of the key representatives of the student groups on campus.

Representatives from the Board of Governors, the Co-op Collective, the Commuter Collective and the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy were among those at the rally.

"These people will go back and report the facts to their individual groups and the word will be passed around among the students that way," Taggart said.

"Maybe our goals will change by the next meeting and they won't want to take over the Sweet Shop."

Another in what Taggart sees as a long series of meetings to discuss the increase in student control of the Student Union Building will be held Tuesday afternoon at 4:00 p.m. in the Commonwealth Room of the SUB.

The complaint included evidence that residence hall managers knew they were misusing funds a year and a half ago.

A statement from residence hall managers Robert L. Cambell and Ashoke Ganguli, to the authority, dated June 30, 1979, stated "The difficulty we face as the trust fund managers is, quite simply, that we are violating the basic covenants that govern each Building Authority project, Dwit, the Management and Services agreements."

Ella Grasso dies at 61; was former Conn. Gov.

HARTFORD, Conn.—Former Gov. Ella Grasso, 61, died last night at Hartford Hospital of complications due to cancer, hospital spokesman James Battaglio said.

Battaglio said Mrs. Grasso died at 5:49 p.m. and was pronounced dead at 6:03 p.m.

She died of a cardiac arrest following multiple organ failure, the spokesman said. Mrs. Grasso had been ill with cancer since last year.

The governor's husband, Thomas, and her children James and Susane, were at her bedside when she died.

Battaglio said the governor's family asked the public "to join us tonight in praying for the governor and her family."

The body was removed from the hospital and funeral arrangements were incomplete.

She had been administered last Roman Catholic rites many times during her 11½-week stay at the hospital.

Battaglio's voice trembled as he made what he called his "tragic" final announcement of the governor's death.

He said it had been her wish to keep the public informed of her illness in a "forthright manner," as he noted she had done during her administration.

Names of doctors and priest were withheld.

Gov. Bill O'Neill said former Gov. Ella Grasso would "receive every honor as a head of state should receive."

O'Neill, speaking about 2½ hours after Mrs. Grasso's death, said that her body would lie in state at the Connecticut State Capitol from 11 a.m. Sunday until 11 a.m. Monday. The funeral was scheduled for noon Monday at St. Joseph's Cathedral.

"My heart goes out to all the governor's family and friends around the state. My own personal heart is breaking," he said.

Reaction poured in with the announcement of Mrs. Grasso's death. Former Sen. Abraham Ribicoff said "Ella Grasso meant love, compassion, integrity, duty and performance."

Sen. Lowell Weicker, R-Conn., said, "I wish God's strength and love for Tom and for all of his. Ella Grasso's achievements can't be dimmed in the sadness of this day."

Notice of Contract Ratification

Ratification meetings to vote on the proposed Collective Bargaining Agreement between the Massachusetts Society of Professors/Faculty Staff Union/MTA/NEA and the Board of Trustees of the University of Massachusetts will be held on:

DATES	TIMES	LOCATION	BOSTON
Wed. Feb. 11,	10am-6pm	Memorial Hall	College I, Lounge
Thurs, Feb. 12	10am-6pm	Memorial Hall	College I Lounge

The proposed Agreement contains an Agency Fee Provision. If the Agreement is ratified, the Agency Fee Provision will require each bargaining unit member who elects not to join or maintain membership in the Union to pay to the Union on an annual basis as a condition of employment an amount equal to the regular annual dues charged by the Union. The ratification meetings are open to all employees in the bargaining unit who are covered by the proposed Collective Bargaining Agreement, regardless of their membership or non-membership in the Union. All employees within the bargaining unit are eligible to vote at the ratification meetings. Bargaining unit employees are advised to bring some form of identification with them to the polls.

Tabulation of ballots will be held at 6 pm on February 12, 1981 at Memorial Hall, UMass/Amherst and at College I, Lounge UMass/Boston. All members of the bargaining unit are welcome to attend.

The Union's most recent financial report, in the form of a balance sheet, is available for inspection during regular business hours at the MSP Office, GRC B, Room 422, UMass/Amherst and at the FSU Office, Building 010, 6-98 Harbor Campus.

a game, but leading the league in rebounding, grabbing 11.5 per game. The Dukes also have a fine playmaking guard in Tom Cvitkovic, complimenting Dixon's scoring, while averaging nearly four assists per game.

UMass will try to counter this balance and depth with a squad that lacks both characteristics. UMass freshman Edwin Green, who, along with fellow freshman Craig Smith, has been one of the few bright spots in this 3-16 season so far, was named rookie of the week in the Eastern Eight for the second time this season.

Tomorrow's game was originally scheduled as a television game on the Eastern Eight cable network, but this year's dismal UMass record, and the prospect of showing a nearly-empty Curry Hicks Cage, scared the Mizlou network away. UMass will not, however, be spared the visit of the Eastern Eight Hoopster Rooster; a feeble imitation of the San Diego chicken.

ing session...on the other hand Plymouth State has always finished strong," coach Bill MacConnell said. "Right now it's a question of keeping my racers on their feet so as to dominate the first ten finishing spots as we did in the earlier races. When this happens we're really tough to beat."

The team moved to Loon mountain on the 25th where they again took first place. John Karwoski of Plymouth State had the best individual time but five UMass skiers finished in the top twelve: Prindle 2nd, Grout 5th, Kundert 7th, Broadhurst 11th and Billings 12th.

The following afternoon brought the giant slalom and the team's first loss. Karwoski again placed first and this time had enough team support to give Plymouth State the win.

On the 31st the team moved on to Waterville Valley where they suffered their worst finish this season, 3rd out of the 8 Osborne Div. teams. Karwoski won as did Plymouth State (B.C. took 2nd), narrowing the point difference to one: UMass 32, Plymouth State 31.

program, so I didn't hesitate in coming," she said. "Coach Barda knew soccer—knew how to apply it."

Since it doesn't receive scholarship aid, the UMass team will have to rely on reputation alone to maintain its competitiveness. The selection of Margini as an All-American will certainly help.

"Everyone wants to be with a winner," Barda said, "although now the competition is getting tougher. Other schools are getting programs and the big incentive is that some other schools offer scholarships."

Barda, who came to UMass as an assistant coach in 1979, said he thinks Western Massachusetts will remain a soccer hotbed. Yet talent in the sport elsewhere, including Long Island, coupled with more participation at earlier ages, prompted Barda to suggest that the strength of women's soccer could become less regionalized.

"I used to see talent from just this part of the state," he said. "But now I see talent back east in places like Needham and Foxboro. Connecticut has some good programs. Eventually I expect to see some players from out of state."

You Can Still Make A Difference

While careers in public service may not be as fashionable as they were a decade ago, such careers can be very rewarding and personally satisfying.

After just three months of intensive training at The Institute for Paralegal Training, you will be prepared to work in government agencies, public service organizations and law firms as a Legal Assistant in the fields of Administrative and Public Law or Criminal Law. You will do work traditionally performed by attorneys. You will work in the dynamic field of governmental legislation and regulation and be involved in such areas as Environmental Law, Food Drug and Health Law, Criminal Justice, Equal Opportunity, Welfare, Energy, and Product Safety Law.

Furthermore, you will earn graduate credit towards a Master of Arts in Legal Studies through Antioch School of Law for all course work completed at The Institute.

We are the nation's first and most respected school for paralegal training, and since 1970 have trained more than 4,000 college graduates from across the country.

One season begins; another drags on

By KEVIN CULLEN
Collegian Staff

Two basketball games will be played this weekend involving the University of Massachusetts. One will involve a team whose season, in some respects, has just began. The other involves a team whose season seems to drag on interminably.

For the UMass women, tomorrow afternoon's game in Boston against Northeastern marks a new beginning.

"Everything else we've done—the hard work, the wins, everything—is nothing now," UMass head coach Mary Ann Ozdarski said after Tuesday night's 66-64 loss to Springfield. "We have to forget about what we have done in all our previous games. We've got to win our last seven games."

UMass (12-8), which had a three-game win streak broken with that loss, will probably have to win their remaining seven regular season games in order to qualify for one of the top four seeds in the Eastern regionals, which would ensure an opening round game played at the Cage.

As UMass assistant coach Steve Jefferson observed, "Right now, it's a seven-game season."

That seven-game season could be made easier by Dartmouth's 72-63 victory over Boston University Wednesday night. UMass faces that same Dartmouth squad this Wednesday at the Cage, and game seven of the seven-game season will be held at BU, Feb. 27.

As for the game at hand, Jefferson describes Northeastern as "small and rugged."

"They (Northeastern) are very aggressive," Jefferson said. "They try to get you off your game. They played us tough twice last year. There were 66 fouls in one game."

While the UMass women will enter the Northeastern game favored, the same cannot be said of their male counterparts. The UMass men's basketball team, currently in the grips of a seven-game losing streak, play host to Duquesne tomorrow afternoon, 1:00, at the Cage.

The Dukes, who had their seven-game win streak snapped Wednesday night when Pitt used a homecourt advantage and Sam Clancy's 20 points to beat them 60-53, are currently tied with Pitt for third place in the Eastern Eight with a 5-3 league record (12-6 overall).

Lanky guard Ronnie Dixon (6-foot-4, 165) has been averaging nearly 18 points this year, second only to St. Bonaventure's Earl Belcher (25.7) in the Eastern Eight. Forward-center John Moore, who at the beginning of the season Rice said was the pivotal point of the Dukes' chances, has rebounded from a knee injury and is the league's seventh leading scorer, averaging almost 15 points per game.

Perhaps the most underrated player in the Eastern Eight, along with West Virginia's Russel Todd, is Duke forward Bruce Atkins, who is not only averaging 13 points

Out of the soccer hotbed

With some varsity teams having problems winning, it's nice to know that the best players in at least one sport are right in our back yard.

The selection of West Springfield's Maddy Mangini to the All-America team of the National Soccer Coaches Association of America is an indication of the women's soccer hotbed that has existed for some time in the western part of the state.

With Mangini, the UMass women's soccer team has lost just three regular season games in two sanctioned varsity seasons and with a constant influx of local talent, has the potential to bloom into a national powerhouse in the 1980's.

Mike Estrada

While many UMass varsity teams include players from Connecticut, Rhode Island and the rest of the East, 18 of the 1980 soccer Minutewomen live in Massachusetts; nine from towns and cities west of Worcester.

Categorized by Banda as "possibly the best soccer player to come out of Western Mass.," Mangini turned down a scholarship offer from American International College to play soccer for UMass.

The rural location of the university might turn-off some big city high school recruits, but the Amherst campus is the preferred school for women to play soccer in the area, and one of the top in the East.

The university has benefited from the developing talent. According to coach Ken Banda, UMass beat all the other top teams in the east last fall, tying or defeating "every single team in the top 10." Cortland State College, the 1980 Eastern Regional champion, was swamped by the Minutewomen, 4-0, during the regular season. The team finished with a 15-3-1 record.

In the short history of women's soccer here, tradition and a reputation for excellence have already been instilled in the minds of Western Massachusetts' schoolgirls. Since, as Banda said, "Western Massachusetts has had soccer longer," than most of the rest of New England, UMass is often the favorite local choice of some of the most talented high school seniors in the area.

"Everyone around here wants to go to UMass," Fullback Mary Sxetella of Chicopee said. "I remember coming to watch them play. They were just a club team then (1978) and they went undefeated. It was my dream to play for UMass."

Innovative intramural basketball

By STEPHEN FREKER
Collegian Staff

On an evening when basketball ruled, with the Celtics playing the Philadelphia 76ers on the tube and the UMass cagers battling (?) George Washington University at Curry-Hicks, you had to wonder what was behind the fact that there were more sneakered people running around shooting hoops down in Boyden Gym rather than watching one of the aforementioned contests.

There can be only one answer. Of course. Intramural basketball season has started.

Tuesday evening marked the beginning of another season of intramural basketball, the sport that anyone (well, almost anyone) can play.

This year's schedule, like last year's, will consist of five regular season games. There is one new innovation however. It has to do with the determination of playoff berths.

During the intramural football season, a new idea was employed in which all teams whose records were over .500 percentage-wise, were assured a spot in the post-season playoffs. This innovation was instituted in attempt to increase participation. It was fairly successful and many teams expressed approval of this new system. Therefore, this season, the new qualification procedure will also be used to determine IM basketball playoff berths.

Intramural basketball is open to men's, women's, and co-rec teams and as of Thursday afternoon, late team entries were still being accepted.

In intramural basketball, there is usually a predictable style of play. Most games will have an exceptional team matched against a collection of buddies from the same floor from one of the towers who really don't know too much about the game. They figure they'll just show up and maybe they'll get lucky.

In Wednesday night's action, the second evening of IM hoop, these predictable assumptions held true. Marc Thompson's Bad News Bears, a perenial intramural sports entry, trounced an outmatched Bunker Hill five 73-15. In this first of the season game for the Bears, Kevin Downing effectuated a good transition game and forward Bob Seltzer pumped in 29 points, several buckets coming off seeing-eye outlet passes from Downing. Kenny Fulgham tallied 14 for the winners.

Sometimes the matchups are more evenly balanced as was demonstrated in a later game Wednesday night when Horsefeathers got by the Thatcher Redwoods in an early season intraleague showdown. Mike Shea and cousin Bill Shea led a disciplined team offense and Bill Shea contributed a few steals on "D" to spark their team to the 57-48 win. Mike Shea was all over the court in this encounter. He scored 23 points, ripped down 9 rebounds and dished off innumerable assists. Not bad for a 5'10" guard. Joe Anderson scored 15 for the Redwoods.

Spikers host Boston College

By RANDI J. MARCUS
Collegian Staff

The UMass men's varsity volleyball team's fourth season will get underway tomorrow as the spikers take on Boston College at NOPE at 1 p.m.

Coach Al Morel is an optimistic about facing the Eagles, as he is about the upcoming season. "The team has three goals this season; to win the New England Open, become-NECVL (New England Collegiate Volleyball League) champions; make it to the Eastern playoffs. These are pretty lofty goals," admits Morel, "but I think the great amount of dedication the team members have will make them capable of succeeding."

The Minutemen participated in a scrimmage at Massachusetts Institute of Technology last weekend. "We really dominated the teams we played, but, net violations and timings hurt. I expect the team to do really well against B.C. especially if Pat Ryan plays," Morel said.

Co-captain Ryan, who received the MVP award in last season's New England All-Star game, possibly has strept throat.

Other strengths of the team are co-captain Mark Farrante, who has had a lot of varsity experience, and middle blockers Steve Geryk and Jack Chandelor. Geryk and Chandelor are up from the junior varsity team and are said, by Morel, to be the main strength of the team along with setter Ryan.

Last season UMass finished in second place in the top two divisions of the three-division NECVL. As well as fielding two teams in the NECVL this season, UMass is participating as a full member of the New England Division (Division III) of the Eastern Collegiate Volleyball League (ECVL).

Skiers tied, hope to pull ahead

By JOHN GARDINIER
Collegian Correspondent

A string of 12 consecutive divisional championships will be in jeopardy this weekend for the men's ski team.

UMass and Plymouth State (N.H.) are now tied for the number one spot with 38 points apiece. Boston College is currently third in the battle for the Osborne Divisional Championship with 32 points.

The season began on January 17th at Berkshire East in Charlemont. UMass skiers Brian Prindle and Bob Grout finished 1 and 2 to insure the slalom win for the Minutemen. Massachusetts' skiers Scott Billings, Tony Kundert, and Scott Broadhurst finished in the top ten as well giving UMass its largest margin of victory this season. Plymouth State took second with Boston College taking third.

"We have always done well at the start of the season as a result of our excellent train-

New King budget could cut UM funds

By ED LEVINE
Collegian Staff

Funding for the Amherst campus of the University of Massachusetts will be decreased by about $600,000 if a fiscal year 1982 state budget plan recently announced by Gov. Edward J. King is passed by the legislature.

According to analysis of the budget prepared by University President David C. Knapp's office, funding for the Amherst campus would be cut by about .7 percent, $606,815. UMass-Amherst is projected to receive about $86,196,120. Last year's appropriation was $86,801,935. The campus spent about $84.6 million in 1980, according to the analysis.

Funding for the recently reorganized state higher education system is expected to increase slightly, with about $336.8 million budgeted. The state allocated about $333 million in fiscal year 1981.

The share of the pie for the entire UMass system is expected to decrease, with 42 percent of the funds going to the institution. Last year, UMass received 40 percent of the higher education budget, the report states.

Budgets for the UMass-Boston and Worcester campuses are also expected to change, with Boston receiving a .4 percent, or $103,912 cut, and the University of Massachusetts Medical School in Worcester receiving an increase of three percent, $423,492.

The report also states that funding for the president's office would be increased by about 2.7 percent, $13,595, for a total allocation of $513,595.

According to the report, part of the apparent cut stems from the governor's elimination of allocations for equipment purchases, which received $1.1 million last year. Taking this into account, funding for the Amherst campus was actually increased by about $300,000, the report estimates.

To make up for the loss of the equipment budget, the governor has created a $5 million equipment reserve account within the state education department, according to the report.

To offset possible shortages in the budget, the report states that special reserve accounts have been created for energy funding and salaries. About $3.5 million has been set aside to cover potential increases in energy costs and another $124.2 million was allocated to cover potential salary increases which may arise due to collective bargaining and management pay increases.

In addition, the report states that the budget also provides $2.3 million in operating funds for the Board of Regents, the governing board created last year by the state legislature to run the entire state university and college system.

The report also states that $1.1 million will be maintained for library purchases and $1,815,000 for student aid. Funds for disadvantaged students will decrease by about 2.2 percent, to a total of $806,500.

The analysis did not offer any recommendations or assess the possible impact of the budget.

SGA to take stand on UM-Boston merger

By KATHLEEN HOWLEY
Collegian Staff

The controversial merger of the University of Massachusetts at Boston with Boston State College will be the topic of the Student Government Association's first meeting of the semester tonight at 7:30 at 106 Thompson Hall.

Ron Keefe, an assistant to the SGA co-presidents, said this would be an informational meeting designed to educate the senators about the re-organization plans.

"We'll be discussing how UMass (Amherst) will be affected," he said. "It will mostly be a strategy session."

Governor King initiated the merger last year in a money-saving effort to consolidate the state's 28 public colleges and universities. In a proposal by a special task force to the new Board of Regents two plans were suggested. Under the first, the merged university would still be represented to the Board of Regents by the University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees. In the second plan, it would become a new city university with a separate Board of Trustees.

The Board of Regents will decide how the $330 million budgeted for higher education this year will be alloted.

Richard LaVoice, co-president of the SGA, said he is concerned about the implications the re-organization will have for the Amherst campus.

"There's a wide range of questions that will spin-off from this," LaVoice said, "and we have to separate the rumors from the facts."

According to LaVoice, there's a possibility that the quality of the PhD programs and the Graduate School will be affected.

"If the quality of the university diminishes," he said, "it would damage our reputation."

Linda Geary, speaker of the Senate, said she hoped students, faculty and administrators would attend the meeting.

"This is a big issue," she said, "and it will affect UMass for a long time."

How does it feel to be handicapped?

By ELIZABETH HERMANCE
Collegian Correspondent

Both the handicapped and non-handicapped are invited to attend a day-long program Tuesday on handicapped affairs including films, special equipment demonstrations, simulation exercises and special appearances by the National Theater for the Deaf.

Handicapped Awareness Day, will be held in the Student Union Ballroom from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. and will feature a performance of the "The Iliad, Play by Play" at the Fine Arts Center by the National Theatre for the Deaf, at 8:00 p.m.

Handicapped Student Affairs Director Paul Appleby said Awareness Day has two goals; first to inform people and give them an idea of what it is like to be disabled so they can respond to the handicapped student.

Secondly, Appleby said he hopes the program will inform handicapped students, especially the less visibly handicapped, of the many services available.

Appleby also mentioned the difficulty in simulating deafness as an important focus of the day-long program, and said he hopes greater appreciation of this handicap will be possible.

The program is sponsored by the Handicapped Student Affairs Office under Appleby's direction, and with the help of Merle Ryan, coordinator of deaf

Polish workers to strike, are promised support

By THOMAS W. NETTER
Associated Press

WARSAW, Poland — Workers in the southwestern city of Jelenia Gora on yesterday called a general strike and national leaders of the independent union Solidarity met there to discuss the possible spread of strikes to nearby cities.

The strike, set to begin yesterday, and the promise of support from union leaders in the region came as the Communist Party's Central Committee prepares to meet during the week. A Supreme Court ruling on an independent farmers union and the opening of the Polish Parliament are also to take place this week.

And the state news agency PAP said yesterday that officials investigating the dissident Committee for Social Self Defense, known as KOR, had found the organization was trying to undermine Poland and its communist allies and was aided by foreign "political subversion centers."

Announcement of the government investigation suggested a new, tougher stance on dissidents. KOR members have been advising Solidarity, which was formed last summer during a nationwide wave of strikes.

Last week, Warsaw Radio reported members of a group called the Confederation of Independent Poland also were under investigation. The group's leader, Leszek Moczulski, and six of his associates are being held by authorities for trying to weaken Poland "by bringing about social tension jeopardizing the country's security and public order," the radio said.

A critical move in Poland's labor turmoil is expected tomorrow when the Supreme Court is scheduled to consider a proposed union of independent farmers, who own 75 percent of Poland's farmland and produce 80 percent of its food.

The court has been studying the farmers bid for registration of "Rural Solidarity" since Dec. 30 when the farmers appealed an earlier lower court ruling denying the charter. Solidarity backs the farmers, but it is unclear if it would strike if the court rejects the farmers' application.

Dwyer freed, expelled from Iran

By The Associated Press

An Iranian court convicted jailed American writer Cynthia Dwyer on spying charges yesterday, sentenced her to time already served and ordered her expelled. The State Department said Mrs. Dwyer would be released to Swiss authorities early today with her departure from Iran to follow shortly.

At his home in the Buffalo, N.Y., Mrs. Dwyer's husband, John, said he felt "tremendous, grateful, thrilled, relieved" at news of the pending release of his 49-year-old wife, who has been held by the Iranians for nine months and three days. Mrs. Dwyer denied the spying charges at her trial last Wednesday, according to Iranian press reports.

Dwyer said he and the couple's three children had no word of Mrs. Dwyer's travel plans.

In Washington, State Department spokeswoman Anita Stuckman said the plans would be determined by the family.

The State Department had been informed that Iran wanted Mrs. Dwyer to leave the country immediately upon her release, she said.

Mrs. Dwyer, an occasional writer for Humanist magazine who her husband says went to Iran to research the Iranian revolution for free-lance articles she hoped to sell, was convicted on four charges including "indulging in acts of espionage against the Islamic Republic of Iran," according to Iran's official Pars news agency.

It listed the others as: "establishing contacts with counter-revolutionary agents in order to mediate between them and other American agents; collaborating with an

24 people trampled to death in stampede

PIRAEUS, Greece — At least 24 people were killed and more than 100 others were injured yesterday in a stampede after a soccer game.

Hospital authorities said the toll was likely to rise.

The stampede occurred as a capacity crowd of 40,000 fans started leaving the stadium after a game between Olympiacos of Piraeus and AEK of Athens.

Police said the crush occurred when hundreds of fans began descending toward an exit door which was closed. The people in the back, without realizing that the door ahead of them was blocked, began pushing.

The door suddenly opened from outside, and dozens of people were trampled.

Greek Premier George Rallis and other ministers rushed to the Piraeus hospitals where the injured were transferred.

The state-controlled television network interrupted its program to call for blood donors.

Local sources said the hospitals were scenes of panic and hysteria as people tried to find out if family members were among the victims.

Another black child missing in Atlanta

ATLANTA — Atlanta police launched a search yesterday for another young black child who has vanished, hoping to find some trace of the boy before turning the case over to a special task force probing the deaths and disappearances of 17 black youths.

Public Safety Commissioner Lee P. Brown said the case of Patrick Baltaza, 11, was not immediately turned over to the special 35-member police squad because it was department policy for the missing persons unit to handle disappearances first.

"We receive six or seven reports of children missing every day," Brown said. "Missing persons investigates even if it is someone who ran away from home."

Several federal agencies have been directed to provide the city with more advisors, technical assistance and equipment to help in the investigation. Vice President George Bush announced Saturday the Justice Department will step up efforts to help solve the case.

That kiss is going to cost you plenty

NEW DELHI, India — A devout Moslem in India's Uttar Pradesh state has filed a lawsuit against teen-age actress Padmini Kolhapure for publicly kissing Britain's Prince Charles, the Hindustan Times reports.

The prince got a surprise kiss on the cheek from Miss Kolhapure last December when he visited the set of a Hindi-language film at a Bombay film studio. Charles seemed unruffled by the incident.

Burger denounces U.S. justice system

WASHINGTON — Too much concern for the rights of criminal defendants may be nourishing America's growing crime rate, Chief Justice Warren E. Burger said yesterday.

In a forceful speech to the American Bar Association in Houston, Burger said the nation's criminal justice system "at every stage cries out for change."

The text of Burger's speech was released to reporters.

"Crime and the fear of crime have permeated the fabric of American life, damaging the poor and minorities even more than the affluent," the nation's top-ranking judge said.

"Like it or not, today we are approaching the status of an impotent society whose capability of maintaining elementary security on the streets, in schools and for the homes of the people is in doubt," he said.

Burger said statistics show that in 1980 there were more criminal killings among the 650,000 Washington, D.C., residents than among the 12 million residents of Sweden and Denmark.

ABC Anchorman Max Robinson spoke at Smith College last night.

Reporter says ABC racist

By KEVIN CULLEN
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — ABC news anchorman Max Robinson last night told a Smith College audience he sent his resignation to network executives in New York after he and a black colleague were snubbed during coverage assignments of the recent presidential inauguration and American hostages release.

The resignation, which was not accepted, was sent after Robinson, who is black, and fellow ABC newsman Hal Walker, who was stationed in West Germany, were not assigned to cover the stories.

"It is important for all America to ask what happened to black people that night (Jan. 20)," Robinson told the crowd of about 200 in Wright Hall auditorium.

Robinson, 41, who is ABC's national anchorman at the network's Chicago bureau, said he was snubbed by the network's producers when handing out assignments on the two major news stories.

Walker, who was stationed in West Germany, where the freed hostages arrived for a decompression period stay after their release, was unexpectedly reassigned to cover the Iran-Iraq war, Robinson said.

Robinson said these actions were part of the network's effort to keep blacks away from "an orgy of patriotism," which he said greeted the hostages' return and Ronald Reagan's inauguration.

In the lecture, sponsored by Smith's Student Lecture Committee and the Black Students' Alliance, Robinson said there is a need for a "sincere and open" dialogue between the races.

"If I may be so bold tonight, I tell you that white America has no desire to look at itself, much less at black America," Robinson said.

Robinson said historically blacks in this country have attempted two things: the first group, in which he included scholar W.E.B. DuBois, Urban League Director Vernon Jordan and Martin Luther King, Jr., believes "people of color would have to join the mainstream before gaining acceptance."

The second group, which Robinson said included Malcolm X, represents the nationalist perspective.

Robinson said he believes in desegration but added, "I'm doubtful about integration until there are two healthy sides who can sit down and discuss it with sincerity and without fear."

Robinson said he intends to make a documentary for ABC news on white America viewed through the eyes of black America. He also said he "would not rule out the possibility" that he would not be with ABC in the future.

Robinson, who currently involved in contract negotiations with ABC, said network executives have, on more than one occasion, expressed anger over his outspoken views.

ALP: Alternatives for high school students

By CARINE RAVOSA
Collegian Correspondent

Area school students having difficulty with traditional high school programs can find alternative methods of study at The University of Massachusetts.

"Our program is for kids who had trouble in their high schools and were referred to the education collaborative, said Edward Suglia, director of the Alternative Learning Program, which works in conjunction with the UMass School of Education.

The program provides students with a complete academic education, said Suglia. The students receive credit from their home high schools and graduate in the normal fashion, he said.

UMass student interns work with the approximately 12 high school students in the program, which is designed to utilize programs and departments within the University.

Intern of two years, Chris Nunziato, a Communication Studies Major said her internship gives her a sense of belonging and first hand experience in working with kids.

"The program is highly beneficial to the high school students. After participating in the program they have totally turned around," she said.

"Sometimes teaching these students is extremely frustrating. Some students have mental handicaps when they begin, but it is very satisfying to overcome the difficulties".

Director Suglia said," these kids would drop out of school and would be out on the streets, now they are getting a meaningful education."

He emphasized the participation of the interns. "The quality of the program depends on the college kids, without them the program would not exist," he said.

Interns can earn up to three college credits a semester while participating in the program." It teaches them to make decisions such as if they want to teach," said Suglia.

Suglia said he and the UMass intern work out an appropriate academic program for the high school student according to their abilities, interests and high school graduation. Each morning the student attends classes and spends the afternoons in vocational training, crafts and athletics.

Brian Miner, vocational supervisor and UMass graduate student, arranged jobs for the high school students and helps educate the students in useful skills and crafts.

Miner said he started off working in the Student Union Craft Shop and ended up helping the kids with projects.

He later joined the program officially and was made vocational supervisor.

"Friendships develop aside from school, a new closeness between students and interns," said Miner.

Most of the students have only praise for the Alternative Learning Program.

Matt Mendes a 17-year-old from South Hadley High School said "this is excellent, I love it here".

Danny Begish a 15-year-old from Hadley said he believes the greatest asset of the program is that it enables the student to have freedom to grow and learn.

All of the students acknowledged the importance of a good intern-student interaction.

Rajch Lakota, a 17-year-old student from South Hadley said students, through the intern, can express an interest, whether it be social, academic, or physical.

Lacy Laporte, 20, from Belchertown said "the program is fantastic, the people are the greatest! The personal interaction with the interns is excellent. As a matter of fact, I went out for lunch with my intern yesterday, she said.

Interested in a possible career in Marine or Human Biology, Laporte monitored the course Microbiology of Cancer last semester with two of her interns.

Vocational Supervisor Miner found Laporte, who is also interested in children, a full time job for the month of January working with children aged two months to two years at the Infant Care Education Center.

The Alternative Learning Program may suffer financial hardships in the near future. Tuition money from respective Hampshire county High Schools is in jeopardy with the recent passage of Proposition 2½, said Director Suglia.

"We have a reasonable alternative to high school with the public setting and a good rationale to keep the program going. We are going to lobby and fight hard to keep the program alive and effective," said Suglia.

For those interested in becoming interns, or for those seeking information about the Alternative Learning Program, there will be a meeting this Wednesday night, February 11, at 7:30 p.m. in Cottage B.

Looking back

By Carla Lesh

Seventy years ago this week the Massachusetts Agricultural College sported a weekly newspaper, The College Signal. The lead event of the February 14, 1911 issue was the loss of the college's hockey team to the Dartmouth team 4-0 shortly after an Aggie win over Yale 4-1.

The E.N. Parisean Hair Dressing Saloon of 2 Pleasant St. advertised boned rubber corsets as weekly "assistants" [illegible] they know that these always are right." The [illegible] at price [illegible] to $5.00.

An article quoting freshman statistics revealed over 50 percent of freshmen entering the college planned to work in farm-related occupations.

The Springfield Republican was quoted as "The newspaper that satisfies the editor most."

Twenty years later in 1931 "Le Petit Cafe," starring Maurice Chevalier, at the [illegible] Theatre was also playing for an [illegible] events admission.

The new Physical Education building was nearing completion and Miss Cutler's Gift Shop offered gifts and greeting cards for Valentine's day. While James A. Lowell, Bookseller offered the following poem for the season:

If you will be my valentine
I'll grant your dearest wishes
I promise you I'll [illegible]
And let you wash the dishes.

Bates Blue Book was offering "Beginners" shoes for $7.50 [illegible].

The Lantern War was the major concern in February 1931. Asked [illegible] were charged to the Student Council from the 5 Main campus preceding the conclusion of the war in June. The student forces had just voted to abolish the class organization controls, and a group called Students' Co-Operative Association was beginning to organize. A new food co-op had also "The Scouts."

New fire chief selected

Gerald A. Sanford was appointed Fire Chief for the Town of Amherst, Thursday by Town Manager A. Louis Hayward.

Sanford, presently an assistant chief with the Ithaca, N.Y. fire department was selected from fifty candidates who applied for the Amherst position.

Sanford replaces John T. Doherty, who was suspended by Hayward last year following a dispute over the causes of last September's water crisis.

[illegible] and Sanford has more than 20 years of experience in a [illegible] which community quite similar to Amherst.

"I believe Mr. Sanford is well qualified to head our excellent Fire Department," said Hayward on [illegible].

Sanford was considered to be one of the [illegible] to candidates interviewed by the Fire Chief Selection Committee. The Committee was composed of former Selectperson Sandy Kelly and Stephen Kandy, retired Superintendent of Schools, UMass Director of Environmental Health and Safety, Jewett Robinson, and Fire Chiefs John Bergeron of Lexington and Robert Macauley of Wilbraham.

Sanford, a native of Ithaca, and a member of that city's Fire Department since 1959, holds an Associate Degree in Fire Protection from Tomkins Cortland Community College. A veteran of the [illegible] United States Navy, Sanford has been active in professional fire service associations and service organizations in New York State.

Mr. Sanford, who is married, has two daughters ages 11 and 16, will assume his new duties and responsibilities April 1.

Holly Near performs brilliantly Sat. for enthusiastic audience

By T.R. BROWN
Collegian Correspondent

Holly Near, feminist singer and songwriter, gave a stunning performance on Saturday night at the University of Massachusetts before an enthusiastic crowd of mostly women.

The concert, a benefit for the National Women's Studies Association, combined a concern for the emotional needs of women with the need for political action.

Near, who has performed since she was seven, is a strong feminist who is also involved with nuclear power and various other social concerns. The performance, held at the Fine Arts Center, was sponsored by the Women's Studies Union Council.

"Fire in the Rain", Near's newest album, will be released by Redwood Records, her independently run record label, this summer.

Accompanied by Adrienne Torf on the piano and an interpreter for the hearing impaired, Near sang with vibrancy and emotion such songs as "Working Woman" and "We are Singing for our Lives." Although she seemed a little tired (she is on a ten-city tour), Near was friendly and good-humored. The audience seemed completely at ease and generated a great deal of exuberance.

During one song, "Nicholaya Has a Boat," the audience created unified harmonies which rang with feeling and sincerity. Women also joines in as Near acted out in sign language the line, "something about the women in all our lives."

Many of Near's songs reflect the intense emotional struggle which many women are facing today. Her lyrics portray a myriad of feelings which range from sadness to defiance.

At a time when women are becoming more and more aware of their own importance, it is inspiring to hear someone who can express these thoughts so beautifully. Near's songs ring with a courage and optimism that bring comfort to many. As one devoted fan put it, "Your're beautiful, Holly."

Elvis: Nice-n-not so nasty

Elvis Costello and the Attractions with Squeeze
Orpheum, February 5, 1981

By STEVE WINNIKAN
Collegian Staff

BOSTON—Elvis "Revenge and Guilt" Costello, who burst onto the music scene in 1977 with songs about fear and hate and tales of how he was going to get even with those who had wronged him, is no more. Thursday night, Elvis "Not such a bad guy after all" Costello showed a sold-out crowd at the Orpheum that he doesn't have to be nasty to be good. Gone were the ascerbic comments to the audience (bloody Yanks, etc.). Gone was the possibility that he'd storm off the stage after forty minutes, leaving the crowd angry and unfulfilled. What was there was a masterful performance by a man who's learned to place his music in front of his moods.

This is not to suggest, however, that Elvis has joined the syrupy ranks of laid-back wimp-rockers. Although his angriest songs, such as "Lipstick Vogue" or "I'm Not Angry" were conspicuously absent, any anger that might have been missing from the performance was replaced by sheer musical intensity, a sort of breathless excitement that kept the crowd on its feet throughout the show, made them scream for encores even after the lights came back on, and left them slightly dazed as they left the Orpheum to rejoin the real world.

The 90 minute set consisted of selections from each of Costello's six albums, with an emphasis on the last few, plus a few oldies like "Slippin' and Slidin'". Costello played fully half of his latest LP, Trust, which is barely three weeks old.

Trust is indicative of Costello's new mood; not only does the album touch upon many different styles rather than concentrating on just one, but the cover shows Elvis, quite literally, looking at the world through rose-colored glasses. Trust is a fine album, along the lines of Costello's best work, and he did the songs justice Thursday.

The songs in concert ran the gamut from pop ("Accidents Will Happen") to rock ("You Belong to Me") to rockabilly ("Mystery Dance") to country ("Stranger in the House") to soul ("High Fidelity") to reggae ("Watching the Detectives"), showing off Costello's enormous talent and

The band Signal opened up the (almost) new Blue Wall playing innovative and entertaining funky rock 'n' roll to a large but mostly unaffected crowd Saturday night.

Signal, with Michael Gregory Jackson, guitar and vocals; Ray Mason, bass; Barry Harwood, keyboards; and Chet Pasek, drums; performed all original material encompassing some interesting musical styles from off beat rock to jazzy funk. The music was powerful, yet not inundated with unnecessary sound. Michael Gregory Jackson's

UMass Calendar Events Correction

Commencement is Saturday, May 30 — please make this correction on your calendar.

Off-campus students can pick up a calendar this week on the Campus Center concourse.

Early morning.

It's the best time of day up here on the Mountain. Crews have been making snow and grooming it all night. It glistens in the sunlight, all the way down to the Lodge. Down below, the Connecticut winds through the hills.

It's quiet now, only a few skiers in sight. A whole morning with the mountain all to myself. Soon, I'll be off on the first run. A long, smooth run down the uncrowded slope. The first of many down these slopes and trails this morning.

What a way to begin the day! High above the Connecticut River Valley, but it's as close as your own back yard . . .

It's a great feeling, early morning on the Mountain—the air is crisp, the sun is warm, and

New book collective to open

Food For Thought, a collectively-run, non-profit book service, is celebrating its fifth anniversary with the opening of a new store in Amherst this week.

The new book collective is located at 67 North Pleasant Street and will be open Tuesday through Saturday from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Food For Thought features a selection of the latest books and periodicals on energy issues, social change, sexual politics, food and agriculture and education. Many of these hard to find books and pamphlets are self-published or from small presses. The collective also claims to offer the largest selection of buttons and bumper stickers in New England.

The Food For Thought program started in Amherst five years ago, with the support of local individuals and community organizations. The program members traveled extensively and set up displays at almost 50 conferences, fairs and rallies across the country.

Award applications available

Applications for the Rotary Foundation Education Awards, which offer qualified students an opportunity to study for one year in a foreign country, are being accepted at the International Programs Office until March 1.

The awards, which may be used for undergraduate or graduate study, must be applied for two years in advance of the year during which they are to be used.

The International Programs Office is located in room 239 of the Whitmore Administration Building.

Bonnie Raitt tickets sold out

Tickets are sold out for the Feb. 13 Bonnie Raitt, Tom Rush and John Hall Band Concert at Smith College. There will be no tickets available at the door, concert organizers said Friday.

Students with writing and editing experience may apply to Eric Janszen for the position of associate executive (editorial) editor between Feb. 4 and 18.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

How much is that bug in the window

HADLEY—The first thing John Cautela wanted to clear up before anything else was said or done was that, yes, he was perfectly serious about the whole thing.

"Sure, I'm serious," Cautela replied when asked about his three rather conspicuous advertisements in last week's back-to-school issue of the Collegian.

John Cautela runs a pet shop, Doolittle's Animals, in Hampshire Mall in Hadley. When he became manager of the store last month, he decided it was about time he advertised something original. Cautela looked around the shop and said, hell, why not. So the ads were bought, and the ads were run.

Snakes, hermit tree crabs and tarantulas.

It was that simple.

"Everything we sell is non-poisonous," Cautela says. "They're beautiful pets, great conversation pieces."

"It's one thing to get the things into your dorm or apartment, but what happens if the damn things get too big?

Kevin Cullen

"Snakes should be okay in the dorms," Cautela says. "They'll grow only to the size of their cage. After that, they won't grow any longer, just thicker and wider."

Snakes grow thicker and wider by eating. Snakes do not eat people.

"All of our snakes love humans," Cautela says, referring to the reptiles' sense of affection, not appetite. "Our snakes are very non-aggressive. If they are kept well fed—which is why we sell mice, 99 cents apiece—they're very content and love to be around people."

Cautela's store carries boa constrictors, pythons, garter and corn snakes. All non-poisonous. All love humans. All looking for a home.

Snakes, hermit tree crabs and tarantulas.

Hermit tree crabs are also nice little pets. Hermit tree crabs look like sea crabs a bit, but they don't like the water. Hermit tree crabs like to explore shells.

"They go into a shell—and they're really pretty, the shells, I mean—and they explore the whole shell, inside and out, all over," Cautela explains. "Then when they're finished exploring it, you get them another shell. It's lots of fun."

If your're not into snakes, and you don't like hermit tree crabs, then there is the old standby: the tarantula.

"All the tarantulas we sell are non-poinsonous," Cautela says.

Do they bite, John Cautela is asked.

"Well, yeah," he says. "Anything can bite you. I've never been bitten, but one of employees was recently. It's not much, though. It's like a bee sting."

What, John Cautela is asked, could possibly make a tarantula want to bite someone?

"Tarantulas are very, very delicate," Cautela explains. "If you drop them from just six inches, they'll pop—just break in two. They tend to be nervous when they're handled, and if they get nervous or excited, they might bite you."

The best way to keep your tarantula from getting nervous or excited is by taking good care of it. Cautela's store sells what he considers the best way to keep a tarantula in a cheerful mood so he won't go around biting people.

The tarantula set up consists of a plastic, see-through cage, complete with terrarium stand, waterdish and an artificial tree, which Cautela says the tarantulas especially like to climb on. The top slides off so you may bring forth your conversation piece.

What do tarantulas eat, John Cautela is asked.

"Crickets," John Cautela says. "They love crickets. We even give a free box of crickets when you buy the whole set up. After that, the crickets cost $1 a dozen, 50 cents a half-dozen, which is a pretty good price for crickets."

Cautela still sells puppies and kittens and parakeets like most pet stores. And aquariums, pretty mild stuff compared to his latest promotion, are still the store's biggest seller. But this doesn't discourage Cautela in the least, because like every entrepreneur who has come down the pike in the last 1000 years, John Cautela is looking beyond it all, to the future.

"The whole idea is for this catch on as a fad," Cautela says. "I think having a snake or a tarantula is a lot of fun. I know when I go to a party and the people there have a snake or a tarantula, they're the center of attention. Hey, in California, among the college students, it's a pretty big thing already."

Cautela is reminded there are a lot of crazy people in California.

The pet store manager laughs.

"There are a lot of crazy people everywhere," John Cautela says.

Commentary

The pot calls the kettle black

Last week, Americans were treated with what many conservatives say our leaders have owed for some years now; a justification for the 1969-71 invasion of Cambodia. Two weeks into his term of office, President Ronald Reagan stated unselfconsciously that the United States had warrant to bomb Cambodia for reasons of (here it comes—that old catch-word) "national security."

"It was known at the time," said Reagan, "that Red guerillas...were crossing over the border (into Vietnam) and killing American."

Roger Atwood

Therefore, the President said, many people himself included had come to view "our actions in Cambodia" as justified.

The issue of our involvement in Southeast Asia has taken on a certain 'chic' in reactionary circles of late. Conservative columnists like George Will and William F. Buckley have been carefully prodding us for a few years now to get off our guilt trip and accept Vietnam as called for under the circumstances and a necessary step in our development as a nation. The war, they say, was logically motivated and we had no way of knowing our effort would be sidetracked by well-armed, experienced guerillas, incompetent Democrats, and dozens of other factors.

Gradually, politicians expressing the same ideas came out of the woodwork and in front of the television cameras. Reagan may have been the first (and this observer maintains that he will be more of a leader for conservatives than most people think), with his "noble cause" comment during the campaign. Soon, Henry Kissinger, who devised the Cambodian invasion with Richard Nixon, and some conservative senators, like Jesse Helms, were indirectly—then almost unconditionally—defending the invasion and the Vietnam War in general.

Even Richard Nixon got into the act. When a CBS reporter asked him about his opinion on an entirely different matter, the former president, relishing the television exposure, showed he had been reading the newspapers and got the message that it was, by now, fair ground to defend the invasion. One could almost feel the man's defenses, bottled-up for so long, come rushing out as he, crass as ever, launched into a gushing, pre-worded manifesto asserting the righteousness of "our cause" in Cambodia. Frothing at the mouth, Nixon termed the "mission" as "completely justified at the time."

After he finished his proclamation, Nixon found time to answer the reporter's question; what was his opinion on the recently signed hostage treaty with Iran? Nixon's response added priceless insult to injury. He said the U.S. was not bound by the treaty because it was signed while the 52 were "under duress" and because the seizing of the embassy was a "flagrant violation of international law!"

Never mind that the invasion Nixon had just unequivocally defended—and co-planned—was among the most clear-cut violations of international law since World War II. The Treaty of Vienna may be a dead issue by now, but, nevertheless, the U.S. flouted it by invading a neutral nation, Cambodia. So did Nazi Germany. No one (except the Iranians) is questioning the legitimacy of international law which protects diplomats. But, if there is an issue of degree, certainly the wholesale devastation of an impartial nation, a sort of innocent bystander, would constitute as significant a violation of international ethics, if not law, as the seizing of the hostages.

Of course, it is pointless to examine too closely the words of someone as fatuous as Richard Nixon. Still, his statements and Reagan's reflect something of the new administration's attitude on America's conduct abroad, past and future.

Here at the University of Massachusetts, Professor Anwar Syed tells his World Politics classes that all countries respect international law—but only when it suits their purposes. Maybe President Reagan, who tells us that we, (unlike that horde of heathens the Soviets) have a foreign policy guided by "what is moral," should be reminded of that fact.

Yes, Mr. Reagan, we uphold the highest and holiest ethics in our foreign policy; we endorse the destruction of a neutral nation, while screaming about violations of international law.

Rhetoric add/drop lines are ludicrous

Being a freshman, it is difficult for me to understand why I am obligated to take Rhetoric to meet certain university requirements, but this is not the issue at hand. I am more perplexed as to why the expertise of the Rhetoric department is marred by the incompetent way of dealing with the add/drop period.

On Tuesday, February 3, I waited in a Rhetoric add/drop line that took approximately 2½ hours for me to schedule a class. Upon reaching the window, I was appalled to learn that there were only two people serving to what amounted to hundreds, if not thousands, of students with the same problem as me.

I am told that this has been the procedure for several years. If this is so then why has the Rhetoric department neglected this incessant behavior? There is absolutely no reason for this ludicrous procedure to persist.

Luckily I will no longer be burdened with the tedious deed of trying to schedule a class with the Rhetoric department, as I have fulfilled the requirements necessary. But as a full-time paying student I feel that something has to be done in the future about this absolutely ludicrous procedure.

FINE ARTS CENTER CONCERT HALL

diversity as a songwriter/performer.

As always, the three Attractions—Steve Nieve, Pete Thomas, and Bruce Thomas—provided a strong musical backup for Elvis. The only disappointment was that guitarist Martin Belmont of the Rumour, who joined the the Attractions onstage midway through the show, failed to add much to the overall sound. Although Elvis is certainly not a great guitarist, the combination of his slashing rhythm playing with Steve Nieve's fluid organ leads made a lead guitar unnecessary.

After a final encore of "From a Whisper to a Scream," featuring a duet between Elvis and Glenn Tilbrook of Squeeze, the houselights came one and taped music began playing again. The crowd wouldn't have it, though, and kept screaming and cheering until Elvis finally returned for "I Can't Stand Up for Falling Down," "Watching the Detectives," and "Pump It Up," leaving the satisfied crowd confident that Elvis is still King.

Squeeze played a highly satisfactory opening set. Since the departure of keyboardist Jools Holland, the band has relied solely on guitarist Glenn Tilbrook to act as frontman. They performed admirably, though, drawing songs from their three albums and previewing a forthcoming one. Squeeze elicited quite a good response from what was, after all, Elvis Costello's crowd. This band deserves more recognition.

★Signal

guest and vocals remind one of Jeff Beck and Earth, Wind and Fire in its mixed and high-pitched sounds, but are decidedly the ones in both style and substance.

The first and second sets were predominantly rock 'n' roll while the third set was unquestionably more funky. One song that highlighted Parliament's vocal choices was "Should Have Never Let You Go" on the first set. Although the lyrics were a bit suggestive, and the melody very sensual, Parliament's voices seemed to produce such high pitches that nothing was lost in interpretation. Other tunes such as "Trumpsuit" and "Small Town" went to display the bands versatility in moving from rock to funk with touches of more jazz progressions in Parliament's guitar licks.

What Do You Want From College?

Management Experience? Add It To Your Schedule.

College military science courses are courses in leadership development. You learn techniques involved in the management of resources. Techniques that are applicable to any management job. Another important leadership characteristic is interpersonal relationships. Things are accomplished by people and the kind of relationship established goes a long way in determining your success as a leader. Whether you intend to become a manager in a military or civilian career, Army ROTC can give you a competitive edge.

Don't wait until after college to get practical management experience. Add leadership to your class schedule now.

Men's swim team defeats Vermont by close score

By ANNA ROELL
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts men's swim team defeated the University of Vermont by a close score of 59-54 this past Saturday in the home waters of Boyden Gym's pool. The swim team (2-5) are now two-thirds through their long winter season.

The last even of the UVM meet, the Free Relay, put the men back into first place for the final win the Brian Spellman, Steven Samuels, Chris Porter and Tom Dundon swimming a time of 3:18.23. UMass men swept first, second and third in the 50 freestyle with Porter's winning time of 22:84 and Samuels and Seth LaChance finishing just behind.

Dundon swam a fast 200 freestyle with a time of 1:56.6 and the team's captain, Robert DeConinck took second for another sweep.

"The guys have been working really hard and not had much to show for it," UMass coach Russell Yasworth said. "We swim a tough schedule and it's really nice to get a win. It was deserved."

The UVM defeat, putting UVM's record to 5-2, has the UMass men swimmers looking forward to their last three meets of the season. "We're better than our record shows," DeConinck said.

The men's swim team's next meet will be this Wednesday at 7:00 in the Boyden pool against the University of New Hampshire. "This will be the start of our new winning streak," 500 freestyle swimmer Michael Boucher said.

Gymmen take sixth straight, beat Dartmouth

BY ELIZABETH McGOWAN
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team clinched its sixth consecutive victory on Thursday with a 231.75-219.00 win over Dartmouth College.

Minutemen coach, Roy Johnson, said he was pleased with the victory in Hanover, but that overall, the meet was "rather dull."

After gaining a 6.30 point edge after the first event, the floor exercises, the Minutemen held the lead through the entire meet.

There were several standout performances by the UMass competitors. Senior Steve Craig won the long-horse vaulting competition with a 9.4 and also scored a 9.05 in the floor exercise. Senior co-captain, Hugh O'Neall, turned in a 9.0 score on the horizontal bar to win that event, while Bob Goulart led all competitors in the parallel bar competition with a 7.55.

All-around competitors for UMass included sophomore, John McCurdy, with a 41.40, co-captain Tommy Thomson, scoring a 42.55, Bert Mathieson, with a 41.15 and Hugh O'Neall with an overall high of 48.95.

The UMass gymmen were victorious in every event but the pummel horse and the still rings. Although John McGunagle turned in a fine performance on the rings, scoring 9.35, UMass still lost the event by 1.75 points. Dartmouth's Jeff Steen led all vaulters with a 9.2 in helping his team to beat UMass in that event.

The Minutemen will travel to take on Navy this Saturday.

Hypnosis aids study

By KEVIN McDONOUGH
Collegian Correspondent

Faced with strenuous work loads, More and more students are turning to hypnosis to help them overcome learning difficulties in concentration, recall, and retention.

Milton Askinoss, a hypnotist practicing in Hadley, said hypnotism is a technique that "allows the subconcious part of the mind to surface, giving you a greater sense of suggestibility."

Askinoss has used hypnosis to help cure people of hard-to break habits such as nail biting, smoking, and over-eating. He has also treated people for discomfort from back pain, phobias, and other psychosomatic illnesses, he said.

Askinoss said hypnotism is not a kind of mind control. Contrary to popular belief, a hypnotist cannot force you to do anything against your will, he said.

"We show you the way to help yourself because whatever your mind has caused, your mind can cure," he said. Although hypnotism is a positive tool for behavior modification it is "in no way a substitute for sleep, medecine, or medical attention," Askinoss added.

The students and faculty who visit Askinoss do so primarily to increase their studying efficiency or to quit smoking, he said. Askinoss added that only one visit is usually necessary to improve study skills. He claims a success rate of 90 percent.

Mr. Askinoss's office is located in the Farrick Building, Rt. 5 2 1/2's of a mile from Hampshire Mall (next to Ricky's Hardware) The office number is 584-3119.

The career decision you make today could influence national security tomorrow.

For professionals at NSA contribute to the dual missions of foreign intelligence production and communications security.

Our Electronic Engineers, Computer Scientists and Mathematicians are working with systems at the cutting edge of technology.

Career opportunities and challenge await you in any of these NSA career fields.

Electronic Engineering: There are opportunities in a variety of research and development projects ranging from individual equipments to very complex interactive systems involving large numbers of microprocessors, mini-computers and computer graphics. Professional growth is enhanced through interaction with highly experienced NSA professionals and through contacts in the industrial and academic worlds. Facilities for engineering analysis and design automation are among the best available.

Computer Sciences: At NSA you'll discover one of the largest computer installations in the world with almost every major vendor of computer equipment represented. NSA careers provide exposure of such disciplines as systems analysis and design, scientific applications programming, data base management systems, operating systems, computer networking, security, and graphics.

Mathematics: You'll work on diverse Agency problems applying a variety of mathematical disciplines. Specific assignments might include solving communications-related problems, performing long-range mathematical research or evaluating new techniques for communications security.

Linguistics: NSA offers a wide range of challenging assignments for Slavic, Near Eastern and Asian language majors involving translation, transcription and analysis/reporting. Newly-hired linguists can count on receiving advanced training in their primary languages and can plan on many years of continued professional growth.

UMass gymnast Karen Knapp competes on the balance beam against Temple University this weekend.

Despite injuries, gymnasts top Temple

By MARY SZETELA
Collegian Correspondent

Despite injuries to two all-around gymnasts, the University of Massachusetts womens' gymnastic team tallied its second highest score of the season by defeating Temple University by a score of 129.65 to 99.65, Saturday afternoon at Boyden Auxiliary Gymnasium.

Although there were some outstanding individual efforts, UMass Coach Virginia Evans credited the win to the overall effort of the team.

"Everyone contributed to the win today," she said.

The effort was rewarded with the second highest score of the season, the only other being the 131.55 score earned against Cornell/Yale earlier this season.

The score at the end of the first two events was 66.70 to 52.05, but that was not representative of the entire meet. The Minutewomen dominated all afternoon, winning all four events: the vault, balance beam, uneven bars and floor exercise.

Top scorer of the day, UMass freshman, Robin Low (33.35) put in an outstanding effort, especially in the floor exercise where she sparked the crowd's attention with her poise and originality.

Both Heidi Milender and Chris Paul scored well on the uneven bars while the scores of Karen Knapp and Karen Clemente topped the balance beam event.

Lisa Matteo of Temple finished second with a score of 30.55.

Ankle injuries have kept freshman Kathy Matthews and Michelle Santagate, both top scoring competitors, out of action.

Temple coach, Jeff Rosenburg, was very impressed with the entire UMass squad.

"I look for UMass to go places, they're a good team" he said.

The Minutewomen, 5-1, will host traditional rival, Springfield College, February 14, at 7:00.

Hoopster story remains the same, 83-67

By KEVIN CULLEN
Collegian Staff

What you are about to read is a true story. Only the names have been changed—not to protect the innocent, but because a different basketball team came to town Saturday afternoon.

Different team, same results.

Senior guard Ronnie Dixon's 18 points led a well-balanced Duquesne scoring attack as the Dukes handed the University of Massachusetts their eighth straight loss, 83-67, in a rather lackluster affair before 543 at the Cage.

Duquesne (13-6) placed six players in double figures, with center John Moore's 13 and forward Bruce Atkins' 12, eight of them on foul shots, leading the way. Moore, who Dukes head coach Mike Rice says is the main reason Duquesne has surprised people this year, hit the 1000-career-points mark midway through the first half and received an ovation from the small gathering.

For UMass (3-17), it was the same old story, same old song and dance. A poor shooting first half (7-for-27, 26 percent) left the Minutemen with a 16-point deficit, 39-23, at the half.

UMass guard Tony DePina, who for the first time in ages was allowed to play his kind of open style ball game, led all scorers with 21 points (8-for-17 from the floor, 5-for-5 from the line), including two fine inside drives to the basket.

Freshman forward Tyrone Whitehead scored 15 for UMass, going 9-for-12 from the free throw line, and showed one Brooklyn Boys High move when he went inside on Mr. Atkins with a here-you-want-this-you-aint-gettin-it drive over the Eastern Eight's leading rebounder.

UMass played fairly well in the early going, and help leads of 4-2, 5-4 and 7-6 before successive jump shots by Atkins, Rod Scott, Barnett Harris and Dixon gave the Dukes a quick 11-point lead with 7:51 left in the half.

The Dukes scored seven of the last nine points in the half, one of DePina's drives being the only UMass points in that surge, to take a commanding 39-23 lead to the locker room.

UMass got as close as they would all afternoon when Whitehead smuck in behind Atkins and laid in a missed foul shot to close the gap to 12, 46-34, 4:23 into the second half.

But from there, Duquesne's Tony Long came off the bench and proceeded to score all of his ten points in the last ten minutes of the game as the Dukes got the lead up as high as 28 at several points in the last seven minutes.

Conspicuously absent from the UMass attack all afternoon was their leading scorer, freshman Edwin Green, who ended up with five points and nine rebounds, but for the second successive game seemed unable to get into the flow of the game offensively. Green, a good shooter averaging nearly 50 percent from the floor, hit just one of eight shots on the afternoon.

UMass freshman guard Bill Bayno showed some decent ballhandling most of the game and contributed eight points, as did Craig Smith and Bob Thorne, who saw his first considerable action (18 minutes) in some time.

Saturday also marked the first Cage appearance of the Eastern Eight's Hoopster Rooster, the league's costumed mascot, who put on a pretty good show for the 543 who showed up. At halftime, the Rooster (who, out of costume is a computer programmer for GTE) held a half-court pantomime session with a pre-schooler which made the whole afternoon worthwhile.

DUQUESNE (83)—Bruce Atkins 2-8-12; Rod Scott; John Moore 6-1-13; Ronnie Dixon 7-4-18; Andy Sisinni 1-0-2; Tim Ceitkovic 0-0-0; Joey Myers 0-0-0; Barnett Harris 5-1-11; Tony Long 2-6-10; Dave Tginnis 1-2-4; Terry Tenchoni 0-0-0; John Farrell 1-0-2; Totals 30-23-83

UMASS (67)—Craig Smith 3-2-8, Tyrone Whitehead 3-9-15, Edwin Green 1-3-15, Bill Bayno 4-0-8, Tony DePina 8-5-21,Jeff Bierly 0-0-0, Dave Gems 1-0-2, Bob Thorne 2-1-8; Totals 22-23-67

Wrestlers turnback Springfield

By SUE BRIDGMAN
Collegian Staff

It went down to the wire as expected, as the UMass wrestlers topped a tough Springfield College team, 25-17, Friday night at Boyden.

The near capacity crowd went wild as UMass heavyweight John Allen, pinned his opponent to give the victory to the matmen.

"I felt we could have wrestled better, especially in the close Springfield victories but anytime you beat Springfield, it is a good win," UMass coach Dave Amato said.

UMass 9-2-3 took an early lead, in the 118 pound class with Rich Scharizzi taking Daryl Arroyo, 10-1.

But Springfield fought right back and took the 126 pound class when Joe Arrante squeaked by Dana Rasmussen 7-6.

Springfield also took the 134 class when Bill Reese pinned UMass' Doug Johnson with 54 seconds remaining in the third period.

In the 142 class, Springfield again eked out a narrow victory. With eight seconds remaining in the match, it was all tied up at seven. UMass wrestler Charlie Riggolosi could not get the points he needed for the victory and the match went to Springfield's Greg Georges on riding time.

Springfield took the 150 class, but Mike Carroll wrestling at 158, gained a superior decision victory for the matmen. Carroll just kept racking up the points to finish with a 23-3 of Springfield's Paul Hitchon. This brought the score to 9-15, Springfield.

At 167, Dave McEntee showed the crowd some fine wrestling in gaining another superior decision for UMass, as he defeated Pete Smith 12-2. At this point UMass gained a big psychological advantage when Springfield was penalized a point, after a wrestler from the bench got upset with the referee's calls.

UMass lost another close one in the 177 class, but came back to life on Bill McQuaide's victory over Mark Carroll in the 190. Thanks to McQuaide's 17-6 decision, the score became 19-17 for UMass.

As sometimes happens in wrestling, it was up to the heavyweights to decide who would bring home the victory.

It was John Allen for UMass, and Bruce Keator for Springfield College. Allen had no doubt in his mind who was to be the victor, as he built up a 7-2 lead, before pinning Keator at 2:18 of the second period.

This brought the score to 12-4 Springfield, and things were beginning to look shakey for UMass. But the best was yet to come."

Winning two each, Hyder and Grasso lead trackmen

By JANE WOLFSON
Collegian Staff

Individual winning performances lead the University of Massachusetts men's indoor track team to its first victory of the season, defeating the University of Maine 71-64, Saturday afternoon at Orono.

Junior Mark Grasso captured both the long jump and triple jump for the Minutemen, while setting a meet record in the triple jump with a jump of 46'8" and 21'8" in the long jump.

Sophomore Stephen Hyder was another double winner for the trackmen taking first in both the shotput (49'6") and 35 pound weight throw (49'7").

Paul Beaulieu also captured a meet record in the mile run with a time of 4:10. UMass' Kyle Martin finished second in that race.

The Minutemen swept the two mile race with Kevin Corcoran winning with a time of 9:07.8, Chris Omeltchenko and Steve Snover finished second and third respectively.

Freshman standout Brian Osborne captured the 600 with a time of 1:13, co-captain Bob Pearson finished second to Osborne at 1:13.8.

'We had good individual efforts,'
UMass Coach Ken O'Brien

UMass' Rick Cady won the 400 with a time of 50 seconds.

The mile relay team found similar success against Maine, winning at 3:22.7.

Sprinter Bill DeVarney finished second in the dash to Maine's Kevin Tarr. Gregg Mader finished third in the hurdles for UMass.

"We had good individual efforts," UMass coach Ken O'Brien said.

The trackmen's record now stands at 1-15 with previous losses coming from the University of New Hampshire (twice), the University of Rhode Island, Northeastern University and Dartmouth College.

Future meets for UMass include a tri-meet with Boston College and Holy Cross next weekend at BC, as well as the New Englands to be held at Boston University this year and the IC4A's which are held at Princeton University.

FEBRUARY IS BLACK HISTORY MONTH

by Tony Crayton
Director of Office of Third World Affairs

"February is Black History Month but if you look to the University for an understanding of its significance you won't find any mention of it. Most of the 18,000 undergrads who matriculate here leave without any idea whatsoever of who are 'the Blacks' beyond the images provided by the media and the general omission of Black History from general educational curricula. Black History is not a valuable academic pursuit, since, for the most part it isn't marketable - they can't see how anyone can make money on it. It's locked away in the dismal reaches of their ivory tower's dungeon, protecting their eurocentric curriculum from being tainted by Black History's implications of how they teach students to perceive the world.

That perception is racist; there is no other conclusion to be drawn. Veiled by the protective cover of academic freedom, the 'pursuit of knowledge', these hallowed halls have become the truths that would transmit a racist ideology to a very impressionable white America.

While white America is frantically and fanatically racing to beat inflation and bring back the "happy days"; we bury our dead killed by maniacle murderers throughout the country. The cops the klans and the generally crazed citizens of the land of the free are consistently carrying on the age old American tradition of murdering Black people. Yet white america rallies their resources for the (transmission of the truths that would halts the process of civilizing a very uncivilized white America.

While white America is frantically and fanatically racing to beat inflation and bring back the "happy days"; we bury our dead killed by maniacle murderers throughout the country. The cops the klans and the generally crazed citizens of the land of the free are consistently carrying on the age old American tradition of murdering Black people. Yet white america rallies their resources for the (transmission of the truths that would halts the process of civilizing a very uncivilized white America.

This week I want to race back 5,000 years, at the dawn of civilization when Europe was in the caves and the African birthed civilization.

To travel through time and space we would travel past the pyramids to start the story right. We would past the towering temple Rameses at Abu Simbel and the ancient grave of Osivus at Abydos because the dawn of Civilization began in Nubia the land of the Blacks. The story began in the cellar of the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago.

400 Years of Slavery

by Curtis Haynes
NUMMO STAFF

(The following essay is in no way to be considered a complete history of African-American involvement in the growth of this nation but rather, is to encourage the study and understanding of African-American contributions to the growth of a technological America.)

O, ye nominal Christens! might not an African ask you, learned you this from your God, who says unto you, Do unto all men as you would men should do unto you? Is it not enough that we are torn from our country and friends, to toil for your luxury and lust of gain?

Olaudah Equiano
(sold into slavery in 1756)

Since the very first time African people were brought to America they have experienced oppression. This oppression was founded upon the economic exploitation of America by people originating from imperialist nations of Europe. As a result of the exploitation of African people the infra-structure of the African continent was destroyed and terrorized. Racism is not the cause of racial prejudice in America but rather the result of economic and political policies for growth and expansion taken by this country in the last 400 years.

In 1619, one year before the Mayflower set sail, twenty Africans, (supposedly taken from a Spanish slave ship) the first black inhabitants of the English Colonies, were sold into indentured servitude. At this point in American history there were no distinctions made between black and white indentured servants. These Africans were able to earn their "freedom;" however, for the hundreds of thousands sold into slavery, freedom was not a reality.

Two main reasons that Africans were utilized in the economy of the American continent were: 1) because of the American Indians' refusal to be enslaved in their own country; and 2) because of the susceptibility of the indians to European diseases. Africans were transported from their own country and amid cruel and inhuman conditions sold into slavery. And as they were made more susceptible to slavery, Africans had also grown immune to many of the diseases brought to America by the Europeans.

On the west coast of Africa a high level of artistic and social organization was noted by the first Europeans, and was adapted for their own purpose: the commercial trade of humans. Thus, African men, women, and

Bofill to appear in Bowker

Artista GRP Records recording artist Angela Bofill will perform on Friday, Feb. 20th at 8 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium. Jazz Vocalist Bofill captured music critics with the release of her first album Angel in November, 1978. Bofill moved quickly in the jazz arena'sCasA Box named her #1 Top New Jazz Artist and #5 Top New Female Vocalist Top LPs, six weeks after the release of her first album.

Billie Holiday is a true vocal/local point and because of her, its a musically stimulating, highly visual act."

The 25 year old jazz vocalist has toured with jazz greats Stan Getz, Dexy Gillespie, and Al Jarreau. Hailing from the West Bronx, Bofill started her musical career at four years old. Encouraged by her tenor-voiced father, she began to compose songs at twelve. Bofill formed a band in high school jokingly called the Puerto Rican Supremes. The Bronx Native was the lead soloist with New York's Dance Theatre of Harlem Chorus, for which she also arranged, composed and conducted. "There is no doubt that Ms. Angela Bofill will spread her wings, her song and soar with potencia."

Don't miss this rising jazz vocalist on Feb. 20th. For ticket information contact UPC.

Reagan's Africa team takes shape

Reprinted from Africa News

WASHINGTON, D.C. (AN) The membership of the Senate Africa subcommittee has been settled, and on the House, a chairman is expected to be selected this week. Also expected is the formal nomination of the new assistant secretary of state for Africa, who will be Georgetown University professor Chester Crocker.

Sen's Landon Kassebaum (R-Kansas) will head the Senate panel, joined by Republicans Jesse Helms (N.C.), S.I. Hayakawa (Calif.) and Charles Mathias (Md.). Kassebaum, who was elected in 1978 and is the daughter of 1936 Republican presidential candidate Alf Landon, is a member of the Foreign Relations Committee.

In addition, she has no Africa experience.

Paul Tsongas from Massachusetts, who was on the subcommittee when George McGovern was the chair, is the ranking Democrat, along with John Glenn (Ohio) and Jimmy Carter's Christopher Dodd (Conn.).

Phil Christenson is the new subcommittee staff director, and Alison Rosemary is the Africa specialist on the full committee staff. Christenson has been associate director of the U.S.-South Africa Leadership Exchange Program, a private organization promoting visits by prominent individuals from both countries. Rosemary has been deputy manager of sub-Saharan Africa in the Commerce Department.

Also being considered is a member of the staff of Senator Charles Percy, the new Foreign Relations Committee chair.

The House subcommittee may not likely be either Don Moss (Ha.), Mervyn Dymally (Ca.), or Howard Wolpe (Mich.), who were elected in 1978, but has a total of a core Africa has remained. Stella Wolpe has served on the subcommittee, particularly chaired by Stephen Solarz, who chose to become head of the Asian and Pacific Affairs subcommittee. Another former subcommittee member, William Gray (Pa.), has moved from Foreign Affairs to the Appropriations Committee.

As the State Department's Africa watchers wait and wait again to hear decided on a list of some 80 nominations needed to fill top-staff positions, Crocker's selection appears secure, in spite of reports that a host of several assistantships opposed by a group of right-wing Senate Republicans led by Helms, who says he was never consulted on Crocker's name and is now conferring with Haig on possible alternatives for the nomination.

Crocker has been using the assistant secretary's office vacated on inauguration day by Richard Moose, who has joined the New York investment firm Lehman Brothers Kuhn Loeb. Of the four deputy assistant secretary posts in the Africa Bureau, two incumbents are expected to stay on for now — Lannon Walker, currently the acting assistant secretary, and Pat Haden, who was the Africa specialist on the National Security Council staff in the Ford administration.

Another key area of the department for Africa policy-making has been the Policy Planning staff. Gene Morton, who covers both the central Africa and Mozambique-Angola, southern Africa specialist, have remained at their jobs. But changes there seem likely too.

Alan Keyes, a black foreign service officer described by his colleagues as conservative and Republican, has been transferred from the southern African office of the Africa Bureau to Policy Planning, where he powers observation. Another person likely to join Policy Planning from the Africa Department is Paul G. Hoffman, Bush's choice to direct the Policy Planning staff. Both are probably take a risk or part in the post-Reagan foreign policy review now underway. The Gene Sharp materials is slated for other more study groups, and Policy Planning is to have the major coordination role.

Changes in personnel will apparently also tend to overshadow the arrival of new Carter appointees have already been sidelined or sent upon leave, friends of the two report. They are Walter Carrington, formerly the executive vice president of the African-American Institute, who has been U.S. ambassador to Senegal for four months, and ambassador to Mali more numerous, who was an Andrew Young's organizational staff was an Andrew Young's organizational staff and directed the State Department office when he was UN ambassador.

Reagan is expected to name a new ambassador to South Africa, replacing William Edmondson, and Stephen Low in Nigeria, who played an active role in the Rhodesia negotiations, may also be replaced.

FEBRUARY 9 - Paul Laurence Dunbar, the black poet, who made dialect an accepted literary form, died in Dayton, Ohio. Dunbar was born in Dayton in 1872. He was of an ex-slave. Although he was senior class poet at Dayton's Central High School, and edited all the school paper and year book, he began his career as an elevator boy. In 1893, he completed a book of his verses, "Oak and Ivy", which he sold to passengers on the elevator, which he operated for four dollars a week. In 1896, he published "Majors and Minors", which received a very favorable review by William Dean Howells in HARPER'S WEEKLY. That review brought Dunbar national recognition. The next year, Dunbar's "Lyrics of Lowly Life" appeared, many of these earlier works were published by Howells and Wilbur Wright, who were experiencing with printing as a hobby on a homemade press. In 1897, Dunbar became an assistant in the Library of Congress, a post which he held for only one year. During the last ten years of his life, he produced eleven volumes of verse, three novels, and five collections of short stories.

PUERTO RICO: U.S. MILITARY INSTALLATION ATTACKED

by GERTRUDIS GARCIA NUMMO STAFF

On January 12,1981 a clandestine organization which favors the independence of Puerto Rico claimed responsibility for what is today considered as "the most devastating attack on a U.S. military installation on U.S. soil." The attack caused the destruction of nine (9) fighters jets of the Puerto Rican National Guards. Two other jets, a station wagon and a small truck were also seriously damaged by bombs placed them.

The Boricua Popular Army (Macheteros) group which claims responsibility for the atatck, is one of the various clandestine organizations existing in Puerto Rich which uses sabotage as their way to express their disagreement with political relations between the United States and the isla nd.

During the predawn hours of Monday, January 12, the Boricua Popular Army entered the installations of the Puerto Rican National Guard located behind the Isla Verde International Airport. In order to get access to the base they made a hole in the chainlink fence surrounding the installation. Once inside the base the group proceeded to install time bombs in the planes that were outside the hangers. Most of the planes were completely destroyed because the bombs were installed under the fuel tanks.

According to the information given by officials of the base, the night of the attack only two men were on guard in the installation. One of the guards was at the gate while the other was patroling in a truck, neither was harmed during the attack. As proof that they were the perpetrators of this act of sabotage the Boricua Popular Army left a machete and a small flag with a star in the area where the planes were sitting.

The Boricua Popular Army is also known as the Macheteros because they use a machete as their symbol. In Puerto Rico, as in other countries in Central America, the machete represents the tool used in the sugar cane plantations. It also symbolizes the struggles of the Latin American countries against what they consider to be imperialist regimes. The attack to the National Guard base was carried out on the 142nd anniversary of the birth of Eugenio Maria de Hostos, Puertorrican patriot who fought against Spain for independence of the island.

In a communique that the Macheteros sent to a TV station in San Juan they explained or justified their attack. They mentioned that the political atmosphere existing on the island was one of the reasons for the terrorist attack. In order to understand this point it is important to know the political status of Puerto Rico. At this moment Puerto Rico is considered a commonwealth of the United States. The island is not an independent country nor is it a stateof the United States. Puerto Ricans are American citizens but they cannot vote for the President and the Congress of the U.S., nor receive all the benefits that the American citizenship is supose to guarantee them. These conditions among others help to keep the political issue in disucssion the next four years after the elections. In fact Puerto Ricans have been seeking political independence for more than 250 years. According to these groups the United states is the side that has the power to terminate this condition of political limbo. They do not accept the self determination chorale of the United States each time that the United Nations calls for the decolonization of the island.

Another reason the Macheteros gave for their attack was the Viequenses struggels agains the U..S Navy. Vieques is an island off the eastern coast of Puerto Rico. Most of the inhabitants of the island are fishermen. This island is used by the Navy for its gunfire exercise. The damage that the bombs inflict upon the environment of the island cause the Viequenses muchsuffering. They live in the middle of the island. At one side they have the practice fields (where live bombs can be found) and at the other they have huge underground ammunitions depots. These conditions do not allow the Viequenses to move in their own land. When the Navy decides to have training exercises the fishermen are not allowed to go out in the waters.

There are other reasons contained in the communique that are related to the first two (according to the Macheteros). But the central point that the macheteros wanted to make clear in their communique is that the United States' relation with Puerto Rico is one where only one party has voice, and that condition must be ended.

Last week (Jan.28) Secretary of State Alexander M. Haig had his first conference. He mentioned among other things, how the Reagan Administration will react to terrorism. It was clear that Mr. Haig was sending a message to the Soviet Union. He accused the Soviet Union of promoting terrorism around the world and tried to show some muscles to demonstrate that the new administration would work these problems in a different way. Mr. Haig was asked how the administration would end that terrorism that does not involve other governments (freelance terrorism). He answered that this kind of terrorism is much more difficult to stop.

The terrorists attack in the Puerto Rican National Guard base was that type of terrorism. This attack was done by a group that does not claim affiliation with any political organization in other countries. For this attack the Reagan Administration cannot blame the Russians. The FBI and other intelligence agencies in the U.S. already know the terrorists were PuertoRicen

There is at least one question that must be answered. That is: why people in the Caribbean, Latin America and around the world are taking Americans as hostages or destroying American property or lives? This question sounds hard to Americans who do not know anything about the foreign policies of the U.S. around the world. Any Latin American, Arab, or other member of the Third World countries (even though they disagree with terrorism) can understand why their brothers and sisters use it.

In the case of Puerto Rico, all Puerto Ricans understand that since 1898 (when the United States invaded the island) PuertoRico lost all the political rights that Spain recognized to it. Today 83 years later many Puerto Ricans accept the military presence of the U.S. in the island. Other do more, they not only accept the control of their nation by the U.S. they want to be another state of the United States of America. The third group is composed of those who think that Puerto Rico is a militarily occupied territory. It is under this belief that they do whatever they consider appropriate to liberate their nation. Those who went to the military base to destroy equipment of the National Guard were members of the third group. It could be said that they destroyed the planes not only because they belonged to the National Guard but also because they were symbols of the foreign power on the island.

The case of Iran is the same. The hostages were taken not because they were Americans. They were taken because the Iranians saw in them an extension of the government that gave support to the Shah. We know that the Shah ruled his nation with an iron hand, and we also know that Iranians always thought that the Shah did what he did because he had the support of the American government. When the Americans were taken hostages Iranians were only looking for a public confession of the U.S. regarding its involvement in Iqn.

It is my opinion that in order for this administration to stop terrorist attacks against American people and installations it has to pay attention to what the people of the countries (where they go) have to say. Americans cannot go any place in the world using military force against other people in order to protect what they call the economic or military interests of this nation. Asians, Arabs, Africans, and Latin Americans also have interests that they think they have to protect against anyone who is threatening them. It is because of this that Americans are not well accepted in different places. The people of other countries want to see in the U.S. a partner and not an administrator trying to say to them how to run their countries. If the U.S. does this, the attacks that Americans are suffering would be diminished or stopped totally.

Texas Court victory for bilingualism

Reprinted from the Guardian

In a scathing 67-page landmark opinion, U.S. District Judge William Wayne Justice of Tyler, Texas, recently found that Chicanos in Texas have been subjected to discrimination in violation of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution.

Judge Justice ruled that the state's current bilingual education plan was inadequate". The program provides bilingual education from kindergarten through third grade only in school districts with twenty or more Spanish-speaking students of limited English proficiency in a single grade.

He ordered the state to put into effect within six years a plan providing equal education for all Spanish-speaking students at all grade levels. An initial plan must be submitted to the court by March 2.

State officials will meet with attorneys for the plaintiffs--the League of United Latin American Citizens (LULAC) and the GI Forum--by Jan. 29 to begin formulating the plan. Citing the urgency of such a move Judge Justice said: " These children have waited long enough to reap the benefits of an adequate education."

"The crippling educational defeciencies afflicting the main body of Mexican-Americans in Texas present an on-going ethnic tragedy, catastrophic in degree and disturbing in its latency for civil unrest and economic dislocation,"he added.

Chicano activists and organizations throughout the state reacted positively to the ruling. "We are elated by the ruling," said one LULAC activist in El Paso. "I thought I would never see a decision like this in my lifetime." LULAC president Ruben Bonilla of Corpus Christi said, "We believe it is a first step on the road back to educational equality for Hispanic Americans."

Texas Gov. Bill Clements and other conservative state officials were bitter over the decision. Sen. Grant Jones, head of the State Senate Finance Committee, which appropriates money for public schools, called the ruling "stupid and ridiculous, something you'd expect from Justice."

Justice has raised the ire of Texas lawmakers for his past liberal stands on a variety of issues. The "liberal meddler", as he is sometimes referred to by disgruntled state officials, ordered a massive overhaul of the state's prisons last month.

Gov. Clements has vowed to fight the ruling "in every possible way". "As before (referring to the recent ruling) I disagree with him wholeheartedly," he added. LULAC's Bonilla responded on a Spanish-language community radio station by saying, "Governor Clements is no great friend to Mexican-Americans. He's anti-Mexican."

State officials' main objection to the ruling is that it will cost the state "untold millions of dollars." LULAC leaders have said that such a claim is a ruse. "We have found money to build super-highways, to improve farm-to-market roads for the farmers and to protect endangered wildlife, and now we Hispanics think it's time to find money to educate our children," said Bonilla.

On public radio, Bonilla was more to the point. "They (the state) can find money to give to rich ventures and to animals, but not to us," he charged.

Whiel most resistance to the ruling has been couched is openly racist terms, Sen. Jones remarked that teaching Chicanos their own language would hurt them. Implying that it is "un-American" to be bilingual, Jones said that the program would lead to U.S. separatism similar to that in Canada where both French and English are spoken.

"One of the things that made this country great is that you can speak one language coastto coast," Jones said. And since Jones controls the educational purse-strings in Texas, he'll make every effort to insure that language is English.

In related development a severe shortage of bilingual programs in the nation's prison is sowing "tensions and discord" because of a growing "communication gap"being created by a sharp increase in the number of Latino prisoners and the absence of such programs.

According to a recent report by the U.S. Parole Commission,the percentage of Latinos sent to state prisons in the past five years has increased at twice the rate of all inmates.The survey of 233 pprisons in the U.S. and Puerto Rico reveals that 19.5 of the total male inmates are Latinos. More than 11 of the federal and state prisoners serving time are Latinos. These figures do not include Latinos confined to county workhouses, municipal jails or precint lockups.

Reagan pays off Big Oil, Military

JANUARY 28-Big Oil and the military industrial complex received a fat giveaway today from the Reagan administration.

The lifting of remaining price controls on domestic oil is expected to add a cool $30 billion to the revenues of the U.S. oil companies. And the government plans to sell 108 M60 tanks to Morocco, a $100 million shot in the arm to U.S. weapons makers, as well as to start production of the B-1 supersonic bomber.

These moves amount to a payoff by the Reagan forces to the big monied interests which put them in the White House, and a double barrelled attack n the working class and the oppressed, at home and abroad.

Pumping up inflation

Reagan's oil decontrol makes a mockery of his earlier claims to "fight inflation". Gas prices at the pump are now estimated to rise from 10 cents to 20 cents; heating oil costs will go up by almost twice that amount.

Such price hikes only warm the cockles of heartless monopolies like Exxon, Mobil, Texaco, and Co., even though for millions in this country the crisis of heatless homes and or maintaining a car can be expected to worsen.

Reagan was evidently unphased by just-released reports that the oil companies are wallowing in record profits this year. Exxon, for instance, made $5.66 billion in 1980, a 32. increase from 1979. Similar rates of profit hold true for the oil industry as a whole.

Energy Secretary James Edwards, a toady of Big Oil who, as former governor of South Carolina, allowed that state to become a vast dumping site for nuclear waste products, stated today that he "didn't want to talk about added costs" as a result of the oil decontrol measure "because we don't want anyone getting any ideas."

A truly incredible statement from someone only eight days in office! Edwards and his boss remember how the last decontrol and subsequent price hikes under Carter sparked mass outrage and protests throughout the country. And already they are fearful of a similar reaction.

Military handout

"While Reagen's oil decontrol measure was impossible to hide from the public, his move to arm the repressive North African regime in Moroco has received much less attention. Over 100 M60 tanks, specially designed for desert warfare, will be used against a popular liberation struggle for self determination in the Western Sahara, led by the Polisario Front. (It is also a slap in the face to Algeria, which played a key role in the recent deal to release the hostages, since Algeria has been the principal supporter of Polisario in the region.)

The decision to sell tanks to Morocco was pushed by General Alexander Haig (the Secretary of State), according to today's Washington Post. Haig, who just left a$500,000 a year job at United Technologies, knows that his colleagues in the military industrial complex are always eager for new sales and under his tutelage, the government can be expected to hand over unprecedented sums to firms like General Dynamics, Lockheed, Mcdonnell Douglas, and, of course, United Technologies.

Rockwell International, for instance, is slated to get tens of billions of dollars from the government for producing the B-1 bomber. The go-ahead to produce the supersonic weapon was revealed today during testimony by Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger in Congress.

FBI: SUED FOR HARLEM RAID

Black residents of an apartment building in Harlem, New York City, have filed a $91.8 millionagainst the FBI and the New York Police Department for a massive and illegal police raid at the building last April 19. Police entered the building in search for escaped Black activist Assata Shakur.

The suit, brought on behalf of the residents of the New York Civil Liberties Union and the National Conference of Black Lawyers, charged that the police raided the apartments without a warrant and terrorized the occupants.

In the midnight raid, more than 50 heavily-armed white agents, dressed in combat uniforms, sealed off a 4-block area around the apartment building. The agents burst into several apartments without warning and ransacked them. They also brutally manhandled and interrogated horrified residents about Shakur's whereabouts. In one incident, agents pointed machineguns at resident Ebun Adelona and her 5-year-old daughter after forcing them out of bed and into a hallway.

Another damage suit stemming from the same raid was filed recently against the FBI. The plaintiff, Bibi Angola, an acquaintance of Shakur who is not a resident of the building, contends that the raid was carried out because she had been in Adelona's apartment earlier that evening to attend a baby shower. Angola was the last person to visit Shakur before her escape from a New Jersey state prison Nov. 2, 1979. Shakur was serving a life sentence on a frame up conviction of killing a New Jersey state trooper.

Plaintiffs' attorneys said they would try to join the two suits. For more information: Center for ConstitutionalRights, 853 Broadway, 14th floor, New York City 10003; tel: 212-674-3303

VIOLENT ATTACKS END STRIKE AT MEXICAN UNIVERSITY

By Jeffrey Allen

San Diego-Subjected to violent right-wing attacks in which dozens were injured, academic and service workers were forced to end their strike at the Autonomous University of Baja California in western Mexico.

The strike had been conducted at campuses in Tijuana, Mexicali, Tecati and Ensenada.

Up to 500 organized "porros"(thugs organized by the administration) launched attacks on union-occupied buildings beginning January 12.

After five days of clubbings, shootings and molotov cocktails, the two striking unions were forced to leave the campus buildings and their picket lines were broken.

Faced with the threat of further violence, the complicity of the peninsula's governor, and a bad financial situation, the unions had to accept an agreement that fell far short of their original demands.

The Academic Workers Union and the Service Employees Union were forced on strike November 17 when the university administration recognized two company unions it had initiated. This was coupled with the firing of more than seventy leaders and activists in the two legitimate unions.

The strikers demanded union recognition, reinstatement of those fired and a representation election to prove that they, not the company unions, represented the workers.

Such a vote was finally held after the strike was broken.

The fired activists were not permitted to vote. But scabs were. In addition there was widespread intimidation, with workers threatened with loss of their jobs if they voted "wrong".

Not surprisingly, the legitimate unions lost the election.

It was a well organized, hard-fought strike marked by a bold outreach for solidarity and repeated mass mobilizations. But the relationship of forces was simply to much for the small unions involved.

The result is a blow to the entire independent union movement.

Poetry Reading

The Amherst English Department is presenting three informal poetry readings this month which you may find of interest:

Monday, February 9: MICHAEL HARPER, Brown University - An Afro-American Poet, author of Oh John, Oh Coltrane.

Monday, February 16: DENNIS BRUTUS, Northwestern University - A world reknowned Black South African poet, currently in exile from South Africa because of his activities against apartheid.

GUNMENT IN EL SALVADOR KILL BROTHER OF LEADING JUDGE

SAN SALVADOR, Jan. 29(AP)-Gunmen burst into a home here today and shot to death the brother of Justice Leonel Carias Delgado of the Supreme Court, the police said. They reported 29 other killings across the country.

Family sources said they could not say why Federico Carias Delgado was slain or by whom. He appeared to be the latest victim in the leftist-rightist political power struggle here.

RACIAL ATTACKS: Klansmen sentenced

Four members of the Ku Klux Klan have been given sentences ranging from one to four years in prison for racially motivated attacks against Blacks last year in Detroit, Mich.

Two of the Klansmen, Ronald Bishop Jr., 21, and Raymond Eblin, 30, received 4-year jail terms, while the two others Donald and Richard Johnson, were given 2-year and 1-year terms respectively.

The four white supremacists were given the maximum sentences allowed under a pleabargaining agreement reached last November as their trial entered its second week. Before the plea-bargain, the four faced a maximum 15-year prison term and a $10,000 fine if convicted by a jury.

In sentencing the four, U.S. District Judge James Churchilldescribed the attacks as "uncivilized," "ugly," and unbelievable." He denied the defendants request for a two-week delay to get their personal affairs in order before going to prison.

Judge Churchill, however, has been criticized for imposing sentences that were too lenient. Explaining the plea-bargain, Churchill said it would be difficult to convince a jury of the defendants' guilt because of the governments "shaky case."

The Klansmen were charged with injuring and harassing a Black Detroit man and a Black family in Romulus, a Detroit suburb, last summer. In the first incident, Biship and Echlin fired a shotgun at 25-year-old George Stewart as he stood outside a Detroit bar in the Brightmoor section. The assailants were apparently angered because Stewart was patronizing the predominantly white bar. They also fired a fusillade of bullets into Stewart's home a short while later. A woman and child inside the house were unharmed.

Donald Johnson was charged as an accomplice after he admitted making a false emergency call to police the night of the shooting to divert attention from Stewarts home.

Brother charged

Johnson's brother, Richard ,was meanwhile charged with planning the burning of a Black family's home in Romulus. The plan, which was conceived in a KKK meeting at Bishop's home, was intended to drive the Black family from the white neighborhood.

A trial witness who attented the Klan meeting said that Bishop had displayed weapons and told other Klansmen that "niggers are stealing our jobs and stealing our women" and that something must be done to discourage Black families from moving into white neighborhoods. Eyewitness testimony also showed that a drawing was held at the meeting to select a person to carry oct the arson attack.

REAGAN AND THE ASIAN-AMERICAN:

Ronald Reagan's smashing victory in the Presidential sweepstakes has been hailed by a large segment of the Chinese – American community – particularly those with attachment to Taiwan – as a positive step for America. In a sampling of three reoincts in San Francisco Chinatown, Reagan received 306 votes, compared to 223 for Carter.

In the country as a whole, Reagan and Carter ran about even among Asian voters – another sign that there should be nothing to fear in the new administration. However, there are at least two reasons for Asian Americans to watch the changing political climate with caution.

The first reason is that blacks and Hispanics supported the reelection of Jimmy Carter overwhelmingly. Nationwide, more than 90 percent of blacks who voted gave Carter the nod, in spite of his broken promise about rebuilding the South Bronx. More than 70 percent of Hispanic voters supported Carter, which cannot be attributed to his boastful of 120,000 Cuban refugees last summer, since more than two-thirds of the Cuban-American voters of Miami were so upset with his handling of the affair that they went for Reagan.

Do blacks and Hispanics know something about Reagan that Asians don't? Or did Carter simply win their approval because he appointed more minorities to high-level positions than any other president in history? Whatever the reason for the sharp difference between voting patterns of Asians and other non-whites, it cannot be ignored that blacks, Hispanics and Asian Americans have much in common, particularly in their reliance on social programs and affirmative action policies. Asians and Hispanics also share the need for bilingual voting, bilingual education, and improved immigration laws.

The second reason to watch the new administration carefully is that the Republicans have gained control of the Senate for the first time in 26 years. This fact, combined with Reagan's wide margin of victory and his pledge to cut federal spending, may bring about an excess of conservatism. The early warning signs have already arrived.

In last Tuesday's election, the voters of Dade County, Florida, which has a large Cuban population, approved an anti-bilingual ordinance to prohibit the county from spending tax money to promote any language but English or any culture but American. A Hispanic rights group has already filed suit in U.S. district court, challenging its constitutionality.

On November 7 in Washington, Republican Senator Orin Hatch of Utah, who is scheduled to become the chairman of the Senate Labor Committee of the Constitution, said that he will push for a constitutional amendment to outlaw affirmative action programs that give special consideration to racial minorities and women. His argument was that affirmativeaction programs "are creating all kinds of government-mandated discrimination based on race only.....They show preference of one race over another, and that just isn't right".

Hatch said he favors a constitutional amendment against affirmative action, which could not be easily repealed by a future Congress: "If we don't go the constitutional amendment route, the Democrats would be back in control in a couple of years and we would be right back where we are now in giving preference to blacks, Chicanos and Asians over whites."

Also during Reagan's first term, it is expected that two or more seats will open up on the U.S. Supreme Court. If Reagan appoints strict conservatives, the result will probably not be beneficial to Asians.

Time will tell whether the Republican Party's champion Asian fundraiser, Anna Chennault was correct in telling Asian Week a month ago: "When Reagan goes to the White House, he'll remember us."

"HITO HATA"

San Francisco....HITO HATA: RAISE THE BANNER, a feature length dramatic film presented by the Northern California Friends of Visual Communications will be shown on Saturday, December 6, 1980 at the Palace of Fine Arts Theatre, San Francisco. A rohost reception at 7 p.m. will precede the film which will begin at 8:30 p.m.

"Hito hata", meaning to "to raise a single banner", was a common expression used by Issei (first generation Japanese immigrants) when they first came in this country. In old Japan, only samurai and the wealthy could fly flags and banners. Driven by poverty from Japan, Issei came to America hoping to make enough money to raise banners of their own. For most, these dreams were never realized and America became their home.

For various reasons, many of these early Issei pioneers were forced to remain single. Being poor and lacking families, their lives are still ladrgely unknown and unrecorized. Though notsuccessful in the economic sense, these men helped build America and are part of the great Japanese-American legacy.

Starring actor and director Mako, HITO HATA tells the fictional story of Oda, a bachelor Issei, living out his days in a Little Tokyo hotel in Los Angeles. Like all inner city neighborhoods, Little Tokyo is undergoing modernization and redevelopment. For an old man like Oda, such change along with old age and ill-health impel him to review his life. Using the technique of flashback, HITO HATA depicts Oda's life, experiences common to many Japanese Americans.

Beside Mako, the film features such well-known actors as TV-star Pat Morita, Yuki Shimoda, Ernest Harada, and San Francisco actor/playwright Hiroshi Kashiwagi, marking his debut appearance in a feature-length film.

If you would like additional information or tickets for the premiere, call 387-4271 in San Francisco or write: Northern California Friends of Visual Communications, 766 Spruce St., San Francisco, CA 94118.

BLACK GROUPS POST STORM WARNING

The growing rightward trend in the U.S. and the upsurge in racism directed against Blacks were the focus of recent grim reports by two major civil rights organizations.

Vernon E. Jordan Jr., president of the National Urban League (NUL), released his organizations annual "State of Black America" report Jan. 14, in summing up the general thrust of the report, Jordan said that 1980 was a "year of storm warnings" for Black America. He forecasted that Black oppression will intensify in 1981.

In another report, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) issued a call recently to President Ronald Reagan to address the plight of the poor and minorities. The commission, warning of growing racist attitudes and attacks, also proposed it would establish a nationwide "Klan Watch" to monitor the activities of the Ku Klux Klan and racial violence in general.

Jordan released the NUL report at a news conference at Howard University in Washington, D.C. The survey, which contained eight separate reports on Blacks' status in each key area in the economy, found cuts and declines, painted a gloomy picture of Black people's condition.

"1980 was a year of continued erosion in the Black condition," Jordan said, "and it was a year in which racial tensions increased alarmingly. I see nothing on the horizon to suggest that the situation will improve in 1981. Rather, there is evidence that it will intensify.

"We expect 1981 to be a recession year, with all the implies for record high Black unemployment and an already devastated Black economy," he continued. "Inflation is expected to remain high, squeezing the family budgets of the majority of Black people who are poor or moderate income even harder. Murderous attacks on Black people in many cities continue to make headlines."

MEAN MOOD

Jordan said concerned statements by Congress members calling for the repeal of civil rights gains won during the last two decades and the elimination or reduction of social programs for Blacks and poor.

On the growing racist and right wing climate, Jordan said since the U.S. people "appear to be insensible to scapegoating, and Blacks have been the traditional scapegoats in American society. The search for simple solutions combines with unfocussed racism to produce a climate in which Blacks are being blamed for national and local problems of which we are the main victims."

The NUL head said that efforts and unselfish threats to Black survival must be opposed every step of the way, and that will call for a revitalization of the coalitions that made possible so many gains throughout the 1960s and into the 1970s."

The National Board of the NAACP, meanwhile, recommended that, 12 days after President Reagan assumes office in the first 100 days at the administration to address the pressing plight of Blacks and the poor.

The recommendations were contained in the draft of a congressional policy statement which generally called for strengthening of civil rights laws and enforcement programs.

According to NAACP director Benjamin Hooks, the NAACP's "Klan Watch" will monitor, catalog and report on all incidences involving Klan-type activities. Hooks said the program will also cooperate with human rights commissions in various cities to develop public information programs on the KKK.

While the NUL and NAACP positions generally pointed out the harsh conditions Blacks face, both offered only moderate solutions and still maintain a conciliatory view of the Reagan administration. Jordan, for example, said he is open to discussing "feasible conservative alternatives" including Blacks appointed to the administration.

Hooks, for his part, warned Blacks that their apprehensions about Reagan were "not of proportion or reality," adding that Reagan's recent meeting with moderate Black leaders and the appointment of a Black cabinet member had allayed some of his own fears.

BLACK HISTORY MONTH

In 1962 when the Aswan Dam project was about to obliterate Nubia's past with the Nile flood waters a last minute archaeological team decided to excavate in an area called Qustul which was considered to be unworthy of further excavation. The expeditions director Keith Seele found an immense cemetery called Cemetery L. The objects remained obscure until after 1977 when Seele died and the projects work was to be passsated. They discovered that it was in Qustul that the first record of a king was in evidence, not in Egypt. March 1, 1979 the New York times wrote on it stating it to be "evidence of the oldest recognizable monarchy in human history".

The discovery calls into question the entire chronology of human history as we have been taught it. In every period of African history "Western" (white) historians have tainted or hidden the most significant events by claims of Indo-European influence, Semetic influence or influences of anybody other than the indigenous people themselves. What we should realize is that history as we've known it is merely ones own interpretation or at times outright lies. E.A. Wallis Budge who is considered to be one of the most distinguished Egyptologist demonstrated a clear ability to lie.

In one book the Mummy (for genetics reading) he stated "of the race of the Egyptian there is no doubt whatsoever he was a caucasian". One year later he publishes a two volume study that says over twenty times: "Everything that we know of them proves that they possessed all the characteristics of the African race". Egypt is a civilization of Black Africa.

Although their seats of power fluctuated between Memphis, Thebes, Napata and Meroe, it was Black Africa that laid the foundations for Western Civilization. Universities have consistently taught that civilizations origins and the development of sciences began in Ancient Greece and Rome. Euclid is noted as the "father of Geometry"; Herodotus, the "father of History"; Hipparchus the "patriarch of Astronomy"; and Hippocrates as the "father of Medicine".

Any scholar of the Bible is well familiar with the great center of On in Egypt near Heliopolis and was called Anau by the Egyptians. Moses, Solon the Lawgiver and Thales all gave adequate record of their having learned their sciences in Egypt. After Alexander the Great of Macedonia plundered in burned the Library there to build his own in Alexandria, it was the indigenous priests who taught Euclid, Clesbus, Hero, Hypatia and Archimedes.

When physicians take the Hippocratic oath they first give homage to Asclepius as god of medicine. Asculpius is the greek name of Imhotep who was the physician of Pharaoh Zoser of the early pyramid age. He was also the chief architect responsible for building the first pyramid which is the first stone building in stone.

It was from Egypt that the science of Chemistry was first developed and where it got its name. Chemi was the Egyptian name for black country.

Their laws governed pharmacy, prescribing the fee of the scientist, astronomers, the use of it and established economic management and accounting for great pyramids and temples. At the time Europe was barbaric, in fact, the Encyclopedia Britannica stated that the world from the laws of Rome or the Napoleon Code owes much to Egypt. Egypt is originality in origin. Greece and Rome can take credit only for dispersing ideas, forms and elements from technology.

The most eminent of Ancient Africa will dwell particularly on the life, literature, [illegible] made known Africa not only a magnificent, human endeavor but an accomplishment that white society is indebted to. Now is the time for us to collect on that debt.

children were supplied to the slave market; and only the "best physical specimens" were accepted and branded with the mark of the trader.

Four out of every ten Africans would die during the "middle passage" of the triangular trade route (from Europe or New England to Africa, and from Africa to the West Indies back to either Europe or New England.) Those who survived the middle passage were unloaded at local slave markets for sale.

By 1641 slavery had become so totally entwined within the economy of the American colonies, and the belief of white racial superiority was so wide spread, that Massachussems passed the first racist law in America by declaring the slave trade legal.

Until 1700, slavery grew slowly. However, a rapid growth in plantation agriculture in the South and the opening of the slave trade to [illegible] after 1700 caused the market to expand. With the increase in the number of African slaves came the adoption of the first racist legal codes designed to govern every conceivable aspect of slave life. Slaves were prohibited from owning land, carrying weapons, and to leave. Thanks to the underground railroad, conductors, slave quarters, [illegible].

Although most Blacks in America were slaves, a few were free. In fact, some free Africans had property in the North and in the South. Free Africans established schools, churches and benevolent societies. Many free African-Americans were able to purchase their freedom from slavery and, through hard work and some assistance from sympathetic whites, to have their children educated. Some even became successful enough to own slaves themselves. One such free African-American was Denmark Vesey, who purchased his freedom after winning a lottery. Vesey, a literate man who could speak several languages, planned a massive slave revolt in Charleston, South Carolina. Betrayed by fellow slaves, Vesey and thirty-four others were executed.

Despite the many barriers placed in their way, a number of African-Americans were able to overcome these barriers and even became financially prosperous.

Around the time of the American Revolution, slavery began to be abolished in the North. This was also the era of the Declaration of Independence, a statement of a people who were looking for righteousness but a righteousness stamped "for whites only."

In the 1780's there was conflict between Northern and Southern politicians surrounding the issue of controlling interests in the American government. In 1787, slaves became political pawns for Southern politicians; they were declared by Congress to be no longer property, but rather three-fourths of a man. (Today African-Americans are still pawns used to gain controlling interests in the American government.)

Because of wide-spread racial prejudice and the suppression of African religion, many slaves converted to the Christian faith. [illegible] a special education which would come in the "real world". This was a beginning of the emergence of African-Americans on the educational scene. Many African-Americans were able to overcome these barriers and even became financially prosperous.

UM president unnecessary, says Moran

By KATHLEEN HOWLEY
Collegian Staff

Richard Moran, co-president of the Student Government Association, told the Undergraduate Student Senate last night that he believed the office of the president of the University of Massachusetts should be eliminated.

"That office has not served our needs over the past few years," he said. "Without the President's office we would have direct access to the (State) legislature."

He said he believes that direct administrative representation from the fourteen campus would make the goals and objectives of the University clearer.

"I have more faith in an administration in an office 200 yards away than in an office in Boston," Moran said.

He said that because of a lack of quorum, the senate could not vote on that proposal last night, but it would be discussed at the senate meeting tomorrow night.

UMASS: The shape of things to come

Editor's Note: The new expansion of the University of Massachusetts that occurred in the 1960's and the early 1970's, which saw the rise of a growing lifestyle, a recognized campus known Commonwealth, and the Campus Center complex, is now, according to the University planners,

The campus, which stretches like a city over 600 acres, will remain pretty much the same as the years to come. But, planners say as the university community grows and changes, the campus will grow and change to accommodate it. Buildings are slated to be renovated and new ones added. Others will be built on the north and south areas. The following are several upcoming changes slated for the UMass campus.

Equine council proposes rink

By SALLY BIGGS
Collegian Correspondent

Construction of a proposed indoor equestrian rink at Hilltop Farm may begin this spring with a $250,000 fund-raising drive by the University of Massachusetts Equine Center Council.

Anthony Barton, director of the UMass Equine Studies program, said the council has raised $125,000 in private donations for the rink. He said the current facilities are overcrowded and poorly ventilated.

Barton described the fund-raising drive as a "private venture" saying "it would be quite a unique thing for the University of Massachusetts to have a facility funded from private donations only." He said many graduates of the Equine Studies Department go on to work for first rate ranches and breeding farms.

Stan Blinks, head riding instructor at Hilltop Farm, cited Mount Holyoke College and the University of Wisconsin at River Falls as two examples of institutions that have indoor equestrian rinks.

Blinks said the planned indoor riding arena will be 80 feet by 220 feet long. It would be connected with classroom space, bathrooms and an horse stalls. She said the University has not yet selected bids for a contractor, but the $250,000 estimate was the result of research on the proposed rink by the Equine Center Council. The construction site is on Hilltop Farm, which is by Orchard Hill.

Blinks said there is a chance for the project to receive federal aid.

Loose bricks plague Bartlett

By PAUL BARRON
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts has requested its Board of Trustees chairman to ask the State Bureau of Building Construction for a solution to the problem of loose bricks on the facade of Bartlett Hall.

Trustees Chairman Joseph Healy plans to ask the BBC to analyze the problem, recommend a solution, and move to repair the building which houses classrooms and academic offices.

The request will follow a recommendation by Raymond Lorenzo of the Lorenzo and Lorenzo engineering firm of Windsor, Conn. that immediate repairs be made. In his report, Lorenzo indicated that there have been loss of bricks in the 26 years since the building's construction. Lorenzo also said that no danger to life or property exists.

University officials called for the Lorenzo investigation following reports to Physical Plant employees of temporary sticker found on the building's south and south faces.

University spokesman Arthur Clifford said estimates for the repairs run from $100,000 to $500,000.

Renovations have also been planned for Marshall Hall where mushrooms were found growing in a study laboratory floor, as part of a retrofit of renovations of older buildings on campus. Laboratories used by the Environmental Science Department will be modernized for use as temporary space for departments relocated by future renovations.

A BBC commissioned study concluded that the best plan to rehabilitate the Marshall labs would cost about $1 million.

House leaders hope to turn state fat into local aid

Associated Press

BOSTON — House Republican leaders said yesterday they will vote for state local aid and will have the support needed to have state government to share the burden of Proposition 2½ with the cities and towns.

The initial purpose of the governor's budget submitted that he said was enough for increased local aid up to $400 million and provide taxpayers for Massachusetts families who rely most public assistance. GOP Leader Willard H. Bulkeley said in a news conference. He was joined by four other Republican House members and one Democrat, Speaker Thomas W. McGee of Peabody.

The group said it believes at least $275 million in Gov. Edward J. King's budget recommendations for the local aid for building daily expenses can be trimmed and give residents.

Bulkeley and the others said they want the state to waive an extra $400 million in commitments to help allow an estimated $600 million local revenue loss resulting from the Prop 2½ tax limiting law passed by voters in November.

King's proposed $5.1 billion budget for fiscal 1985 includes only $25 million in new direct local aid.

Another $75 million, under the GOP proposals, would be available for increased programs in the past.

New legislation to cancel building contract reforms

By DOUGLAS HOSEN
Associated Press

BOSTON — Top labor leaders in the King administration could lead to further gridlock in public building contract reforms, spokesmen for the defiant contractors association yesterday. Peter Forbes, an attorney who serves on the panel and Jonathan Sullivan, its deputy lawyer, approved before the state Administration Committee for separate measures filed by the state Bureau of Building Construction.

They said the legislation would correct key reforms that were enacted last year, signed by Gov. Edward J. King with fanfare and are due to take effect July 1.

The attacked this administration has the gall to propose these changes," Sullivan said.

One of the bills would wipe out the requirement that contractors be certified as qualified before they are allowed to bid on a construction project.

Instead, the screening would be delayed until after the bid of bidders is narrowed to the three submitting the lowest prices.

Robert Sasloff, attorney for the DBC, said the early screening requirement would force the agency to post judgments on 20 to 40 contractors a week. He said this would be an impossible task and would mean every application being submitted would be qualified.

Mrs. Sasaki, who led Connecticut for six years at the end of a 28 year political career, was buried after a three day farewell culminating in a state funeral attended by hundreds and watched on television by thousands more.

After the 10 minute burial service, Gov. A. M. Ella Grasso and four military helicopters approached the cemetery in a "missing man" formation as they passed over the hundreds of about 2,000. The "missing man" formation flew four aircraft flying together and then one of them veering off to the side.

Prop. 2½ tax limits to take heavy toll on state teachers

BOSTON (AP) — At least 5,000 of the state's 70,000 school teachers could be laid off this year unless Proposition 2½ is not fully implemented or the state increases local aid, said Education Commissioner Gregory Anrig.

"We've got two main issues," Anrig said. "Either get more on the school budget is permanent, and then it affects everybody.

Reports of planned teacher layoffs and programs cut backs are emerging daily across the state as school committees wage with the tax ceiling measure approved by voters last November.

School spending improvements about 60 percent of city and town budgets statewide, according to the Education Department.

Anrig said he and the Board of Education have been working all state laws and regulations governing schools to make it easier for communities to comply with Prop. 2½.

Building authority to discuss student law suit

The University of Massachusetts Building Authority is scheduled to meet Thursday for the first time in more than 11 months to discuss a suit filed against the school's Board of Trustees.

The suit, filed by a group of 40 UMass students, charges that the trustees illegally approved both renovation work and dormitory fee hikes without the required approval of the Building Authority.

On Dec. 8, 1983, the trustees approved a $2450 increase for residence hall rent. The hike will go into effect on July 1.

The trustees recently approved a $67,000 contract for work on a new convenience store in the Student Union lobby.

If the Authority chooses it may withhold approval both the redemption work and the dormitory fee increases at its meeting Thursday.

The building authority was responsible for the construction of more than $90 million worth of dormitories, dining commons, the Campus Center and the Campus Center Garage. It is now responsible for financing the buildings, and must approve any repairs or renovations over $5,000 in value to those buildings.

The building must also set and approve any hikes in the student fees that support the payment of construction costs, built fees include the Campus Center fee, the athletic fee for Alumni Stadium, dormitory room and board fees.

Many building authority projects have been plagued with a number of problems and structural defects. For example, the roof and plaza at the Campus Center complex has leaked since it opened in 1971, according to official reports.

Also, the Campus Center garage has undergone $100,000 in repairs to remedy cracking concrete walls and beams. The study of downtown in the Southwest Residential Area says the subject of a 1978 study done by the Boltzmann Associates Inc., which indicated the leaking roofs were result of "grossly workmanship."

According to the Ward Commission's final report which was released last December, "the poor physical condition of many of the UMass Building Authority's buildings have been an annoyance and embarrassment to many individuals who were among the students who pay for the upkeep and operation of the buildings.

"The problems are caused primarily by faulty original design or construction, deficient maintenance, vandalism by students or outsiders, or a combination of these."

Zoning laws must change

Crisis. To anyone who has tried to find off-campus housing, the word crisis is a familiar and personal one. But even after a few desperate people settle for an apartment they don't like and cant't afford, a town-wide crisis still exists.

Evidence of this crisis has recently been brought to light in an extensive study by the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) entitled "Amherst Housing--Still In Crisis." According to the study, there are 8,669 more people living in Amherst now than there were in 1970, but there are only 2,070 more housing units available to compensate for this increase.

Some of the factors contributing to Amherst's stagnant housing growth are uncontrollable, such as skyrocketing costs in building supplies and construction, and high interest rates caused by nationwide economic ressession.

Another burden on the housing market was a change in University dormitory residence requirements in 1978. When juniors in addition to seniors were allowed to move off-campus, the housing market, which barely had enough vacancies to support the previous population, eventually flooded.

Zoning by-laws are another prohibitive factor in housing stock growth. The town's by-laws, enacted in 1971, restrict the construction of apartment complexes to densly populated areas, and were intended to limit sprawling construction during the late 1960s building boom. Since 1973 the town committees have reviewed the zoning policies and recommended changes that would spur planned growth. These changes have been defeated by the Amherst Town Meeting.

Even if the town ammended the by-laws concerning apartment complexes, economic conditions would probably still prohibit growth.

The Amherst Planning Board is now studying a sensible way to begin to alleviate the housing crisis. The zoning changes they are studying now would increase the number of apartments allowed in a single-family home. The present law permits a maximum of four apartments. The board is now studying the feasibility of such a change as well as the number of units which could be converted. They will discuss the issue at a public hearing on March 18.

About 35,000 people--27,275 of them students--now live in Amherst and the population is expected to increase by another 5,000 by the year 2000, according to the SCERA report. The shortage of housing in Amherst has already reached a critical level and will reach even greater proportions if sensible planning is not adopted by the town.

The planning board should recommend these zoning changes to the spring Town Meeting, which might lessen, however slightly, the housing crunch in Amherst.

The zoning changes being considered would increase housing units without the prohibitive capital outlay required to build large apartment complexes.

Leave the ducks alone

It's wonderful that we have a beautiful campus pond that provides us not only with beauty and a tranquil place to be, but also with a place to skate and play hockey for free in the winter. This winter, as the Collegian has already documented photographically, we are sharing the pond with a flock of ducks which has taken refuge at the north end of the pond that remains unfrozen.

I have notice several people, both playing hockey and on the shore, deliberately throwing stones, hockey pucks and the thin-ice signs at these ducks who seem only to be looking for a place to ride out the winter. If you feel the need to throw something at these creatures, why not try food. If you are not going to feed them, please at least try to have a little respect for them.

Revisionism here at UMass

I read Roger Atwood's column about revisonist' explanations of the Vietnam War, "The Pot calls the Kettle Black" with interest. Reagan's support for the bombing of Cambodia is also expressed by a small but increasingly vocal minority of scholars. One of the key academics of this new revisionism is Guenter Lewy, a professor of political science, right here at the University of Massachusetts.

Prof. Lewy became a leading proponent of this new revisionism with the publishing of his book America in Vietnam in 1978. Academia has not rushed to support Prof. Lewy's views. During a session at the Organization of American Historians Convention entitled "Vietnam Revision" no one could be found to replace Lewy when he failed to make a scheduled appearance, and everyone present argued against his book. The Boston Globe reported that reviews of Lewy's book "were scathing; among other things he was called a 'Moral Leper' and his book 'intellectually worthless and morally grotesque'."

It is not surprising that President Reagan has resumed the debate on Vietnam Revisionism.

Performance artist presents 'Transformation'

Jeff Way
Hampden Gallery Feb. 10-28

By STEVE ROSENBERG
Collegian Correspondent

Who is this mysterious figure conjuring up images of a dancing jester entertaining a court of surrealists?

He is Jeff Way, a performance artist from New York who will be performing tonight at 7:30 at Hampden Gallery in Southwest. His paintings and other works also will be on exhibit at Hampden until Feb. 28.

For several years, Way has presented his unique "Transformation" performances to small gallery groups. His costumes include a horned bull mask worn with a flowing white robe, a shopping bag person disguise, and a glittering phantasm blurring past a brick wall. He also has several masks and other outfits he wears during the act.

"I had these dreams, and the mask grew out of them," he said in a recent interview.

Way wears the costumes and masks one on top of the other, and throughout the show removes the layers of clothing. "Transformation" is a gradual shedding of these layers, revealing different masks, different costumes, different personae, as I call them.

"Sometimes when I do them, it's like coming out into a dream," he said.

Performer Jeff Way sports one of the costumes he has designed himself and will wear at 7:30 tonight at a show in Hampden Gallery in Southwest.

"Transformations" takes about an hour to complete. Music is an essential part of the piece, and Way uses recordings of Captain Beefheart's "Do the Low Yo Yo" and Professor Longhair's "Ball the Wall."

"I use a lot of rhythm instruments in the performance," he offers. "Mostly things that I've made. The piece is primarily sound and costumes. There's no talking in it."

Originally from Waverly, Ohio, Way comes from a family of dancers. His mother ran a dance studio, and his sister, Jennifer Way, is a dancer with the New York-based Twyla Tharp company.

Way went to Kenyon College in Ohio and studied art history. He got his masters degree at New York University and began painting soon afterwards.

"I really just concentrated on painting for a few years," he recalled. "It is certain period. I felt like I wanted to use other parts of me, other things to get done. The masks are one way to do that. A lot of the imagery and ideas are the same in my paintings and in the things I use in the performances."

A major source of Way's inspiration can be traced to the masks of African and American Indian tribes. Way has studied an ancient religion based on the belief in primordial spirits. "Scientists define shamans as religious magicians; those who transform spirit into matter. That always seemed to me a perfect definition of an artist.

Recruitment Meeting for UMass Transit Service

Bus Driver Training Program

Applications for the UMTS spring bus driver training program will be given out to the first 100 qualified people on February 10, at 7:00 pm in the Campus Center room 165-169. To qualify for the program you must be over 18 years of age, have held a drivers license (Class III) for at least 1 year and be a UMass student with at least 3 semesters remaining here at UMass. You must have proof of class year and your drivers license, a UMass I.D. alone is not sufficient proof of class year. This is the first in the application process and attendance at this meeting does not guarantee employment with the Transit Service. For further information call 545-0091. The UMass Transit Service is an equal opportunity affirmative action employer.

Edge of night.

You see the lights blazing up and down the Mountain almost as soon as you hit the highway. Like beacons, they beckon you to the slopes.

And when you reach the Mountain, you're in a tunnel lined of light. Top to bottom, it cuts through the edge of night, illuminating the slopes and trails. Down in the darkened valley, lights blink back at you as far as your eyes can see. But up here, you ski down the slopes as though it were high noon.

Later, when the mountain air builds up your appetite and thirst, you meet your friends for hearty food and drink at Tom's Tavern. What a way to end the day! High above the Connecticut River Valley, but it's as close as your own back yard . . .

Design exhibit features costumes and sets

By SUSAN RING
Collegian Staff

Be they filthy rags or satin gowns, costumes have a role in setting the mood for a play. Likewise, a set goes beyond a playwright's desire to express the feeling a design artist wishes to convey to an audience.

The First Annual Theater Design Exhibit, in the Student Union Gallery, running now through Friday, presents costumes and sets from various theater productions. Seven UMass graduate students display their work ranging from an elegant gown designed by Judi Stanley to slides flashed on a projection surface by lighting designer Jamie L. MacAllister. The bulk of the exhibit is composed of costume and set renderings including several set models.

Francis G. Brugh's set model for "Tremonisha," scheduled for a March production by the University Ensemble, is an especially exciting piece. Made of balsa wood and cardboard, the model incorporates aspects of cubism and dadaism, resulting in a set that reflects the confusion of the main character's mind.

"I was influenced by the colors of Joan Miro (early 20th century Spanish artist) in this . . . the use of a blue background with splashes of bright color. It looks like a circus. It is a fun set," said Brugh.

Jamie L. MacAllister's work combines multimedia constructions and an eye for the way things look on a stage. Production photos and blueprints of MacAllister's work show the detail and artistry of lighting design in the theater.

"Lighting design is the theater of the future. People are so into movies because they don't have to suspend their disbelief. I try to put some of the same 'you are there' feeling into my work in the theater," MacAllister said.

Set and costume renderings for "Equus," to be produced at the end of the month, point out the cooperation between designers. Rini Kelker has designed the set and Marie Speer, the costumes.

"Marie and I coordinated our colors (in the renderings) so that the director can visualize how the costumes and set will actually look together," Kelker said.

Before Kelker began to design the set he sat down with the other members in the production to get a feeling for the play by reading the script.

"Enlarger" gives a strong sense of isolation. When I think of boredom I think of this tile bathroom I have. This is where the tile design for the set came from," Kelker said.

The Student Union Gallery is usually open from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Call 545-0762 for exceptions in this schedule.

★Student Senate

Senate Speaker Linda Geary said she believes the President's office has done an "inadequate" job representing the Amherst campus.

"The President must represent all three campuses," she said "each with a completely different mission. We've been left out in left field."

Senators also discussed the proposed merger of UMass/Boston with Boston State College.

Ron Keefe, assistant to Moran and co-president Rich LaVoice, told the senators "for better or worse the merger is now happening." He said the merger was scheduled to be implimented in September of 1983.

"Amherst wasn't considered in the merger," Keefe said. "(The Board of Regents) hadn't thought of the ramifications to the Amherst campus."

Kenneth Moore, chairman of the Public Policy committee, said the Board of Regents is "very inexperienced and knows very little about higher education."

Moore said he though the board "will be eaten alive by the (state) House Ways and Means Committee" and will find out that they need us."

IN 1864, THIS PERSON TURNED DOWN OUR JOB OFFER.

Looking back at it, our friend appears rather shortsighted. In 1864, The Travelers had just started doing business. He was concerned about the uncertain world situation and decided to stick with a job with a future. So he turned down our offer and went on selling blacksmith supplies. The rest is history.

Our point is, in the hundred-plus years we've been doing business, The Travelers never lost faith in the future. Through good times and bad, we've achieved our growth by daring to innovate. In 1864, we were the first company to insure against accidents. In 1919, we were the first to offer aircraft liability insurance. In 1979, we were the first company to install the Distributed Claims Processing Computer – the fastest way there is to pay claims. We could go on, but you get the point.

Today, The Travelers is a Fortune 500 company with wide-ranging career opportunities in accounting, sales, engineering, underwriting, data processing, finance. We're taking the lead to make sure no man or woman at The Travelers is shortchanged when it comes to having an equal opportunity to succeed.

Our Representative will be visiting your campus on February 17. Your Placement Director has additional information.

At The Travelers, we're ready to meet the future, starting yesterday.

Successful Careers Don't Just Happen

At the Institute for Paralegal Training we have prepared over 4,000 college graduates for careers in law, business and finance. After just three months of intensive training, we will place you in a stimulating and challenging position that offers professional growth and expanding career opportunities. As a Legal Assistant you will do work traditionally performed by attorneys and other professionals in law firms, corporations, banks, government agencies and insurance companies. Furthermore, you will earn graduate credit towards a Master of Arts in Legal Studies through Antioch School of Law for all course work completed at The Institute.

We are regarded as the nation's finest and most prestigious program for training legal specialists for law firms, business and finance. But, as important as our academic quality is our placement result. The Institute's placement service will find you a job in the city of your choice. If not, you will be eligible for a substantial tuition refund.

If you are a senior in high academic standing and looking for the most practical way to begin your career, contact your Placement Office for an interview with our representative.

We will visit your campus on: MARCH 3, 1981

Reagan saves seven programs from the axe

By THOMAS HUNT

WASHINGTON — President Reagan, trying to win support for deep cuts in social spending, has decided to exempt seven federal programs for the elderly, and for now, the White House announced yesterday.

The president's budget-makers hope the action may head off the political uproar sure to explode from special groups and Democrats when Reagan sends his $[illegible] billion budget to Capitol Hill on Feb. 18.

Legal advice available at draft counseling service

By TOM HEPPEN
Collegian Correspondent

A new draft counseling service in Amherst is available to those interested in learning about options regarding draft registration, but the service will not be in full operation until several court cases are decided.

One lawsuit involved discrimination against women who are not required to register. The other lawsuit challenges the constitutionality of requiring social security numbers on draft registration cards.

Court decisions are expected this summer.

Father Paul Unbenger, director of the Amherst Draft Counseling Center, said "right now we're making some of an informational effort. We don't take a pro or con position, but merely make the facts available. Then facts on the individual concerns with legal matters."

He said, "It is because of this neutral attitude that we were allowed to maintain a presence in the Post Office during registration." The last registration period was in January.

Funding for the non-profit organization comes mostly through private donations and homemakers from some colleges.

"The center can be reached by telephone at 256-8314, or by mail at," Box 835, Amherst.

Open house at women's center

By ANNE KIRBY
Collegian Correspondent

The Everywoman's Center will hold an open house in Wilder Hall today from 4 p.m. to 6 p.m. to acquaint the University of Massachusetts community with the center's services.

It will be an informal session at which the staff will be available to answer questions and give information, said Melanie Miller of the center's staff.

Created in 1972 as a result of the collective efforts of several local women's groups, the Everywoman's Center has grown into a multi-service organization, according to the literature prepared by the center. Staffed by 12 paid professionals and several volunteers, there are eight major areas of concern at the center: rape awareness, Third World women, employment counseling, violence against women, educational alternatives, resource and referral, personal counseling, and public relations and outreach.

The primary goal of the Everywoman's Center is to increase awareness for all women through skill and information sharing, the pamphlet states. Open Monday through Thursday, 9 a.m.-5 p.m., Friday, 9 a.m.-4 p.m. and Saturday, 9 a.m.-1 p.m., there is always a resource and referral staff person available to answer calls, provide specific information and resources, or offer support.

BLACK AFFAIRS

The Origins of Black History Month

In February, 1926 Dr. Carter G. Woodson, director of the Association for the Study of Negro Life and History, launched the celebration of Negro History Week. It soon became national knowledge that the second week of February would be devoted to the achievements of Afro-American men and women. The effort was widely supported by Black schools, churches, and clubs, and the message gradually found support among institutions of other groups in the United States and abroad. Distinguished Black scholars offered their services as speakers. In some schools teachers had special essays and courses prepared to inform the students of people of African descent. The Association for the Study of Negro Life and History was hard pressed to supply the demand for pictures, story books, and plays which filled the publishing catalogs.

"We should emphasize not Negro history, but the Negro in history."
—Woodson

"If we would know history," wrote Carter G. Woodson in 1937, "we must actively toss king with the exploits of Assyria under the trials, the campaigns of Caesar, or the conquests of Napoleon. Wherever we discern attention as instruments in the destruction of undesirable regimes in clear the way for the new, but these military chieftains were not intentionally great men. They aspired to be impudents, expositors, and oppressors, rather than benefactors of humanity."

Those who should be statesmen, Woodson emphasized, were inventors and engineers, artists and musicians, and "the makers of literature."

"Day is the meaning of Negro History Week. It is not so much a Negro History Week as it is a History Week. We should emphasize not Negro history, but the Negro in history. What we need is not a history of selected races or nations, but history of the world void of national jealousies, hate, and religious prejudice. There should be no indulgence in undue eulogy of the Negro. The case of the Negro is still before some of whom it is unaware how he has influenced the development of civilization," said Woodson.

By the mid-1930's many of the concerns which Woodson expressed in 1926 and later were still shaped by Black Americans, but there were differences as well. Under popular pressure, Negro History Week, which had been preceded by the actual birthdate of Abraham Lincoln on February 12, and the supposed birthdate of Frederick Douglass on February 14, was now forgotten. What is more, in the eyes of many Black folk "Honest Lincoln" had become, not so much the humanitarian and Great Emancipator of slaves as he was felt to be in earlier times, but a clever and calculating military strategist who did what he had to do in order to preserve the Union.

The recognition of "Black achievement," while continuing to be of importance to Afro-Americans, had been largely wrapped from the experiences of the Black middle-class whose public celebrations of "First Negroes" had become just downright silly: the First Negro to visit the White House, the First Negro to ride in a car, the First Negro to bowl at the moon, etc. A new generation of Black historians, influenced by intermingled approaches pioneered in France and England, had begun to concentrate less on the achievements of certain less on the achievements of certain Black individuals and more on how the lives masses of Afro-Americans collectively shaped their lives under adverse conditions. Generally, Black History Month's [illegible]

VD infects many students new lab to open for testing

By STEPHANIE KLEIN
Collegian Staff

Five years ago, a new strain of venereal disease was discovered in England named Chlamydia.

It is estimated that between five and ten percent of the students at the University of Massachusetts are now infected with Chlamydia and a new lab will be opening in a few months on campus said Dr. Bruce MacDonald, acting head of the UMass microbiology department.

Dr. MacDonald discussed the problem facing the lab.

"Fifteen percent of the world's population is now infected with the disease and twenty percent of those will be affected severely," said MacDonald.

"Up to twenty percent of infantile pneumonia is caused by Chlamydia," he said, "a less damaging, but equally prevalent result of Chlamydia is conjunctivitis in the newborn."

The worst aspect of the disease is that it is a "non-symptomatic infection," MacDonald said.

The teset to determine infection is difficult to perform, he explained. "It involves tissue culture and there is a problem in diagnosis."

Strep lab less fortunate

While the Chlamydia lab will open with state funds, another university lab has not been as fortunate—the Strep lab.

Located in the Public Health building, the Strep lab has suffered major funding cutbacks imposed by Governor Edward J. King, said Anne Wood from the University of Massachusetts news bureau.

To cope with the funding cuts, the lab is now charging for patients' testing of strep coccal infections and strep throat tests. The tests had been offered for free.

"A major problem with the cutback is the restrictions imposed by the Health Education and Welfare department on lab personnel," said George Clay, microbiology supervisor at Health services.

The lab had employed university students, but is now forced to seek qualified laboratory technicians to meet the minimum standards imposed by the department of Health, Education and Welfare, said Clay.

UMass prof. gets King appointment

Dr. George P. Faddoul, University of Massachusetts professor in the College of Food and Natural Resources, was appointed last week to the Massachusetts Board of Agriculture by Governor Edward J. King.

Faddoul, who has been with the faculty of the College of Food and Natural Resources for the past 30 years, is the first veterinarian ever appointed to the Board.

A former chairman of the Board of Registration in Veterinary Medicine and the New England Board of Registration, Faddoul was recommended by the Massachusetts Veterinary Medical Association. He is recognized as an authority on avian diseases and veterinary public health.

The Department of Food and Agriculture is under the superivision and control of the Board of Agriculture. The board consists of seven members, each representing a different county, and the members are appointed to seven-year terms. At least four members of the board must be farmers.

Faddoul is a strong believer in the production of food grown in the Commonwealth, due to the uncertainties of production and distribution costs in the industry.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The other hostages

AMHERST—Fifty two hostages are still being held in the University of Massachusetts library tower. Swedish diplomats who tried to get in to see the hostages were turned away because the radical librarians guarding the building said, "They didn't have valid Spring ID's."

Psychologists say the 52 may be suffering from 'Moscow Syndrome.' The hostages have been kept on floor XX18.JZ. They have been subsisting solely on Socialist and Communist literature for the past 18 months.

Negotiations for the hostage's release [illegible] because library officials refuse to deal with the administrators. Chief Librarian Mae East said, "The Administration is mean. They don't pay us enough, and they say we [illegible] and smoke cigarettes. We refuse to have anything to do with them."

Librarians took the hostages by surprise last June. Evelisted "overdue books and reading fees of the library" as reasons for their capture. Douglas Pawlenka, another librarian added, "After a while we got used to having them up there, and didn't want to let them go. We feel we've improved scholarship at UMass. Many more students now come to the library, hoping to see the hostages. We've become, in effect, an apathetic dumb student body [illegible] one that knows how to use the card catalogue."

The R.O.T.C. offered yesterday to attempt a rescue mission, but the administration seized the plan, claiming Chancellor Herbert DooDad told reporters, "It's too dangerous. We may need the helicopters at any moment to ease clerical workers, nurses, teachers, or students go on strike again. In that case, we'll have to hide the records and our coffee thermoses, and make a quick getaway."

For the hostages it is day 514 in the Library Tower, Amherst.

I finish reading this in the newsroom. I feel depressed. Still no change in the hostage crisis. I can't think of anything to write about either.

Suddenly, a secretary runs in.

"Three of the hostages have escaped!" she says throwing memos in the air. I hurry out of the office to ask the story of the century. I expect to see a mighty throng, but no one is outside. It is snowing. New Englanders aren't afraid of anything except snow. I battle through the snowflakes, and finally reach the library. I don't even have gloves on.

Many men are walking around with raglan tunics on their backs. Their teeth are chained, their hands blackened with ink. They are thin and emaciated, and have been [illegible]. They are dazed and confused. Some fall in their hasty flight.

Other than that, they are in perfect health.

I rush up to a former hostage with a long gray beard down his knees. "Go with the press. How are you? How does it feel to be free?"

"Kinda cold," he says, rubbing his arms. "What happened to the weather?"

"Never mind that. How do you feel about all the attention you're receiving?"

"What attention?" he asks.

"I mean the attention you will receive. Heads of corporations, honorary degrees, the R.O.T.C. band playing 'Hello Dolly' whenever you go. Say, I'll bet you're really anxious to see your wife."

"Not really. The last time I saw her, I divorced her."

"Uh, well, what are you going to do with the rest of your life?"

He leans at his beard, then his eyes light up.

"I'm going to form a ghost corps and [illegible] customers. Then I'll retire to the South of France."

"They have said the guys enough anyway!"

"We took the elevator down. Well, see ya."

"Living to eat your words!" I said.

"I think I'll go to the Blue Wall Inn."

Commentary

You can only vote the plague away

There is a plague, a subtly kind of pestilence which is now festering in the capital of our state. Many have succumbed to this peculiar infection, but the most notable among the attacks makes his home in Winthrop and is currently [illegible] as the State House. And we, as students of this University, are all endangered by his sickness.

Jon Hendeigh is a Collegian guest commentator.

Students with writing and editing experience may apply to Kris Janssen for the position of associate executive (editorial) editor between Feb. 4 and 18.

Artists interested in political cartooning and illustrating for the editorial pages of the Collegian are invited to submit samples of their work to the editorial department.

Writers who would like to write for the editorial pages are likewise encouraged to submit writing samples.

Film urges women to unionize for health, safety

By ANDREA ATKINS
Collegian Staff

Unionization is the most effective way to deal with occupational health and safety hazards said the workers in a documentary film called "Working for Your Life" shown last night in the Campus Center.

"The union should be the one to take care of the occupational health and safety needs on the job," said one worker in the film. "They're (management) on the job to make money," she said.

The hour-long movie, sponsored by a coalition of local and university groups concerned with health and women's issues, was filmed in 40 different work places around the country. It concentrates on the plight of the 42 million working women in this country who, according to the film, usually are forced to take ten days to earn the wages a man earns in six.

The film states that without a union workers are usually afraid to complain about unsafe working conditions. To illustrate, the filmmakers, Andrea Hricko and Ken Light, went to the Bunker Hill Smelting Plant in Kellogg, Idaho where workers are hired only if they can prove they are surgically sterile or otherwise unable to conceive. The lead present in the plant causes birth defects. According to the film, no government action has been taken concerning this policy.

One woman in the film who said she had herself sterilized explained that Bunker Hill was "the only place she can make money in this valley."

Women are likely to have jobs where stress and extreme physical hardships abound, the film stated. They are also expected to maintain their traditional household jobs; over five million women have children under the age of six. Such situations increase the number of stress related diseases in women.

Stress is usually found on factory production lines where workers are encouraged to go faster, the movie stated. But stress is not limited to such occupations. School teachers, waitresses and flight attendants also suffer extreme tension.

Another problem faced by workers is the constant danger of permanent disfiguration caused by heavy machinery. Paula, a woman whose had had been caught in a machine, discussed the difficulties of having only one hand. She cannot thread needles, crack ice cube trays or even button clothing, she said. Being female, she said, makes a difference. "A lot of emphasis is placed on women's hands," she said. The company where Paula worked was fined $150, the movie reported.

The film asserted that more attention is paid to the occupational hazards faced by men than to those faced by women.

"Workers often have to fight for the right to know exactly what they're working with," one woman said. Judy Southern, a retired iron worker recalled wiping asbestos dust off her coffee cup and thinking nothing of it. "At the time we didn't know what it was," she said.

Workers are organizing safety meetings, the film reported, and the results have been good. "I have to look out for myself," one woman in the film said, "no one else will."

An examination of clerical workers' environment was also included in the film. One clerical worker interviewed in the film called clerical work "mini-jail." Such jobs are often tedious and usually low paying according to the movie.

The film, attended by about 60 people, was followed by a discussion of worker safety.

Nomination papers for the office of Student Government Association President will be available on February 18th in Rm. 420, Student Union Bldg. from the Governemntal Affairs Committee of the Student Senate.

Canadien ballet troupe ends fine UMass series

By ANNE KIRBY
Collegian Correspondent

Les Grands Ballet Canadiens ended a four week tour at the UMass Fine Arts Center Sunday night before an enthusiastic audience.

Those who braved the weather were well rewarded by the two hour performance given by the Montreal based company. The company performed their varied repertoire before a half full house.

An overall entertaining performance, the opening selection "Hangman's Reel" was well received. Choreographed by Brian Macdonald, the eleven movements were inspired by the music of Quebec fiddler Jean Carignan. Untraditional in nature, the dancers were quick-paced and proved to be a test of the dancers stamina and endurance. "Hangman's Reel" was the story of the handsome stranger who is about to be hung for an unknown crime only to be saved by the music he produces from his fiddle.

One of the highlights of the evening came with a program change in which "Soaring," choreographed by Doris Humphrey and "Turn-Tiddle-Um" choreographed by Brian Macdonald were performed in place of "After Eden." Both short selections, they proved to be fine examples of the company's versatility.

In "Soaring," the five female dancers appeared to be doing just that. This effect was achieved through the use of a parachute and unusual lighting techniques.

"Turn-Tiddle-Um," performed by two dancers, was quick-paced and the most amusing selection of the entire evening.

Started from a small company twenty-five years ago by Ludmilla Chiriaeff the company has grown steadily. Today they have an extensive and varied repertoire which includes all styles of dance. In 1974 Brian Macdonald succeeded Ludmilla Chiriaeff as Artistic Director of the company.

Freshman Nancy Philips lets the sunshine in by washing her window in Southwest Residential Area last Saturday.

UMass Student Dancers start performing tomorrow

By LISA LANGONE
Collegian Correspondent

On February 12, 13, and 14 at 8 p.m., there will be a UMass Student Dance Concert in Bowker Auditorium at the University of Massachusetts.

The concert will be a student effort, including the production and choreography of the compositions. Seven original pieces will be presented, incorporating many different styles of dance. The pieces offered will include "Catch Can You Nothing," a jazz piece choreographed by Denise Aubin, done to the music of Ashford and Simpson, "Odd Permutation," a modern selection done by the group to electric music, choreographed by Donna Castleberry, and "Swan Fake," a satirical ballet done to the music of Tchaikovsky, choreographed by Kathy Bistany. The performance will include a variety of dance majors, non majors, and some of the University Dancers.

Tickets for the UMass Student Dance Concert are $3 for the general public, $2 for students and senior citizens, and $1 for children. Tickets may be purchased at the Bank Theater Box Office Monday - Friday, 1 p.m. - 4:30 p.m., at the door, or at the cafes in the Campus Center Commons beginning this Wednesday.

Local aid to rise if Medicaid cap approved

BOSTON — Gov. Edward J. King said local officials in 70 towns need not fear the loss of state financial aid if the state wins federal approval for a cap on Medicaid.

King, meeting with the Local Government Advisory Board yesterday, said the Medicaid ceiling was a "very, very cautious gamble[illegible]" that could free $200 million in state funds for the city[illegible] in local aid.

King also promised to run both various state programs but allowed the agencies the discretion to guard against spending for such programs as job training, anti-substance and control prevention, saying "I am confident that these dollars are very well spent."

Northampton Mayor David Mvers[illegible] observed that King had been "tremendously astute" when he initially proposed to increase local aid by only $60 million. He said this has to be viewed local leaders to grow city and town budgets as much as possible.

Moral Majority pledges $3M on anti gay media blitz

By DAVID KOPTEN
Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — A coalition of fundamentalist groups, calling San Francisco the "fudge nut capital" of the nation, says it will spend $3 million on a media campaign attacking homosexuals.

The coalition said it will buy advertisements to build an anti-gay feeling in the community and attempt to persuade homosexuals to give up their lifestyle.

"I agree with capital punishment, and I believe homosexuality is one of those that could be coupled with murder and other sins," said Evan Wyatt, a spokesman for the Santa Cruz Moral Majority, one of the groups involved in the campaign.

Homosexuals have been complained in recent months of an increase in violence against them, including beatings by people who activists refer to as "homophobics," and some expressed concern that the planned crusade will heighten tensions.

"It certainly is a situation of grave concern," said Richard McIntyre, editor of the gay newspaper "The Advocate."

"It sounds like things could get pretty ugly," added the editor, who said the Moral Majority apparently had mailed leaflets to the newspaper's subscribers.

Accepting in the Mail, Richard Knox, where Is God We Trust Inc., groups is spearheading the campaign, some $3 million will be spent, beginning with a mail and media blitz.

Skiers win 2

by ANDREW WINDSOR
Collegian Staff

The UMass women's ski team won two races and came in second in another this past Sunday and Monday at Loon Mt. in New Hampshire. UMass maintains a lead in the Women's Intercollegiate Ski Conference (WICSC). Plymouth State College is second followed by Keene College, Brown, and Saint Michaels College.

The first race on Sunday was a slalom race which UMass won by a narrowing margin of more than eight seconds over second place Plymouth, third was Keene College. The second downhill race followed suit but had little effect on course conditions since it remained icy. The winner of the race was Lisa Klein of Brown who outskied skiers in the event. Ski Indoor was hungry full of UMass, and running out UMass top skiers were Theresa Collins (coach and Ski Pirates) in eighth.

The second day two good slalom races were run each consisting of one run which took the best women approximately 50 seconds to ski. The first race saw Plymouth State win UMass by less than half a second. Snoopy Tull took a rare spill and Bruna's Klein raced to another victory. A strong performance was turned in by UMass's Sue Saxby in third place, Sarah Ann Cohen and Jodie Fell eighth.

The second race saw UMass beat out Plymouth by a comfortable margin. Klein was again followed by Snoopy Tull and in what seems like her favorite pastime was taken in fourth versus Saxby. this season.

Tyrone Whitehead's follow halfway to Hadley. It made the night.

A Tony DeFina lay up made it 49-46, 8:15 into the second half, but that's as close as UMass got as everyone who played for Hampton got into the scoring act.

But, the night was marked more when a DeFina steal and lead to Green left the Hamptons with a bang as they slunk, a technical foul, and is warning to Rambis (Right warns that he will be around three more years.

Though the Cage crowd was small last night it was a vocal one and it left Green with some thoughts.

"I heard the crowd tonight, and that's great," said Green, who turns the year his team earned Eastern Eight rookie of the week. "They (the crowd) were behind us tonight. Everybody's been down, the way the season's going and all. But the crowd was lively, and I'd like to see more of them."

As the Cage crowd has shown all season, with Mr. Green, the feeling is mutual.

Cabinet appeals budget cuts

By JAMES GERSTENZANG
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan gave three Cabinet secretaries a chance yesterday to make direct appeals before he finally decides where his budget-cutting ax will fall.

But deputy White House press secretary Karna Small said "there were no fundamental disagreements" on spending reductions and that when the meeting broke up, the president, his aides and the Cabinet members "were looking for additional cuts."

With one week to go before he unveils his plans to slash as much as $50 billion from proposed 1982 budget increases, the president is focusing almost entirely on the economy.

Reagan met in the White House Cabinet Room with Agriculture Secretary John Block, Interior Secretary James Watt and Richard Schweiker, secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services. He will hold several such sessions with Cabinet members.

Energy Secretary James Edwards was present, but his budget had not been taken up when the 90 minutes allotted for the meeting elapsed.

Reagan, with a red plastic, looseleaf binder open on the Cabinet table in front of him, posed for pictures with his advisers at the start of the meeting, but made no public comment.

Kennedy proposes tax breaks

By DANIEL BEEGAN
Associated Press

BOSTON — Sen. Edward M. Kennedy said yesterday he will propose additional tax breaks for industries that invest in making their plants and manufacturing processes more energy efficient.

Kennedy said his proposal, to be co-sponsored by Sen. Malcolm Wallop, R-Wyo., would raise the maximum tax credit to 30 percent of an investment. It now is 20 percent.

The plan also would broaden the types of equipment and other spending that would qualify for tax credits, the Massachusetts Democrat said, and would reward industries that develop innovative ways of saving energy.

It will be introduced in the Senate within a month, Kennedy said.

Kennedy also said he may ask Congress to provide reimbursements to energy-saving companies whose profits are too low to allow them to take advantage of tax credits. He mentioned the steel industry as an example.

Kennedy was flanked at a news conference at the federal building by Charles E. Walker, a Washington-based business lobbyist who is a member of President Reagan's Economic Policy Advisory Board, as well as by Massachusetts business leaders.

Walker said Kennedy's proposal would mesh well with Reagan's plans to cut personal and business taxes. But he said he was not speaking for the Republican president and had not discussed the Kennedy plan with Reagan.

Kennedy said the existing energy tax credit program is too restrictive and fails to provide enough incentive for capital investments.

"It makes sense for us in Massachusetts," Kennedy said of his proposal. "What this tries to do is shift some of our incentives in the energy area toward energy efficiency and productivity."

Kennedy said most tax incentives now are aimed at increasing production of energy, rather than at encouraging its conservation.

State auditor becomes judge

By THOMAS S. BROWN
Associated Press

BOSTON — After 17 years as state auditor, Thaddeus Buczko stepped into a judgeship yesterday, leaving behind a post with few powers.

The 58-year-old Buczko became associate judge of the Essex County probate court after a campaign in which Gov. Edward J. King, who appointed him to the bench, received major support.

But the odd Saturday-night appointment at the State House ceremony he was departing from an agency "quite capable of meeting any challenge in the coming decade."

Buczko's, in many persons understandable, Buczko repeatedly fought with the Legislature, most often over his refusal to relinquish the auditor's position by granting it subpoena power.

Several lawmakers followed the advice of the state constitutional commission last year and gave that power to the attorney general — the state's top legal official. However, a standoff between the governor, Buczko and the attorney general has prevented anyone from being named to that post.

A number of improvements were made in the auditor's staff during Buczko's tenure. Its number of certified public accountants rose from five to 23, and the office branched out into performance and data processing audits.

However, the auditor's review remains confined to the state agencies. He has no power to examine the finances of the many private firms that provide goods and services to the state.

Before leaving his elective post, Buczko recommended his deputy, Aubrey Cohen, for the new fo slot. However, Gov. Edward J. King and Attorney General Francis X. Bellotti both had their own favorite for the appointment, creating a three-way standoff.

Under the new fo type, the three officials must agree unanimously on the fo appointment. Buczko indicated he was willing to compromise, but King and Bellotti thus far have refused to budge.

A bill pending in the legislature would allow the fo selection to be made on a majority vote. That measure is expected to alleviate at least on the Legislature trouble to unanimity in the auditor's job.

Sinatra wins license approval

By LINDA DEUTSCH
Associated Press

LAS VEGAS, Nev. — Frank Sinatra won unanimous approval from a hearing board yesterday for a limited license to become a casino executive again, after a little help from his friends, including actors Gregory Peck and Kirk Douglas.

The Nevada Gaming Control Board recommended the state Gaming Commission approve at its Feb. 19 meeting Sinatra's request for a license as a "key employee" at Caesars Palace hotel-casino.

The limitation suggested by the board was a six-month license to see whether Sinatra can keep his temper under control and avoid problems that led to the revocation of his license in 1963.

"Maybe he has changed a little bit," said board member Dale Askew. "But I think before it could get the stamp of approval as Mr. Sinatra I would have to establish it on a reasonable period for monitoring."

After the ruling, Sinatra ran and shook hands with each member of the panel, then hurried from the hearing room saying: "I feel very happy."

Harvard names law school dean

CAMBRIDGE — Harvard Law Professor James Vorenberg has been named dean of the prestigious law school, effective July 1, university officials announced yesterday.

Vorenberg, a chairman of the state Ethics Commission, which polices the conduct and disclosure rule and investigates alleged case of conflict of interest involving public officials.

Vorenberg has taught at Harvard Law School since 1954. He has served as the school's associate dean since 1976, helping to supervise curriculum development and long-range planning.

He will succeed Albert M. Sacks, who is returning to teaching. Sacks announced his decision to step down last July.

Vorenberg, 56, is a Cambridge native who says he's proud of the fact he has lived in the city his entire life.

He was born an A.B. degree magna cum laude from Harvard in 1946 and an LL.B. in 1950. He was president of the Harvard Law Review as a student and later served as a clerk to U.S. Supreme Court Justice Felix Frankfurter.

In 1961 Vorenberg became the first director of the office of Criminal Justice. He also was one of Archibald Cox's principal assistants in the early stages of the Watergate investigation.

He also helped establish and was director of the Center for Criminal Justice at Harvard, which sponsors research in the administration of the criminal justice system.

Court upholds state determined rates

BOSTON — The state Supreme Court yesterday upheld the decision by Insurance Commissioner Michael C. Sabbagh to set automobile insurance rates for 1981.

The opinion by Justice Francis J. Quirico, who wrote a 1981 work, declared a competitive ratemaking, sought last June by the Metropolitan Property and Liability Insurance Co. in 1980.

The court backed Sabbagh's view that there is insufficient competition within the industry to permit competitive rates.

The companies argued that the competition this year was unlawful and sought to have its case plan, that is Auto Applied.

"The commissioner's decision to exercise his strong authority herein to wait for individual insurer proposed rates," the court said. "Therefore, on June 30, 1980, private passenger motor vehicle rate filing made by Metropolitan on have in force or effect."

Students receive book discount

By M.W. MULCAHY
Collegian Correspondent

Students buying textbooks at the University Store's Textbook Annex are getting a five percent discount off the publisher's retail price while 22 percent of large college stores are adding a percentage on top of the retail price.

Winthrop Cummings, manager of the University Store, said the Annex has been able to give this discount last year and make a five and a half percent profit, or $130,000.

Cummings said the biggest problem with the Textbook Annex is faculty turning in their book orders late.

"Four hundred and forty-five orders were turned in by the October 27 deadline," said Evans. "By December 31, we had 1454 orders. By January 30, the number was up to 1697, and we've had 72 more orders since February 2. Everyone wants their book yesterday."

Another problem that Evans noted is faculty ordering their books off campus.

"Not only is this an inconvenience to the student but they also lose out on the five percent discount," Evans said.

Evans and Cummings also said the University Store has had to refund money to students in the Massachusetts Rehabilitation Program, athletic program, and the Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black Students programs, who had to buy their books off campus and then have the programs reimburse them.

"That paperwork ends up costing money," Evans said.

All profits from the Textbook Annex and the University Store go into a trust fund which goes into paying the bond on the Campus Center and the rest goes into improving the building.

John G. Tilley, of the Campus Center Business Office, said all the businesses of the Campus Center have been operating in the black for years.

"The only exception to this is the Campus Center Garage," Tilley said, "and that was transferred to the parking office about three years ago."

"These profits are why the Campus Center fee has stayed the same for five years," Cummings said.

Some of the excess profit made by the Campus Center has gone into a computer system which the Textbook Annex has used to set up computer printouts to help students find the right books, Evans said.

"Because of these listings, the lines have been much shorter this year," Evans said.

The efficiency of the annex is due largely to the minimum of handling involved which saves money, said Evans. The books are delivered directly from the publisher to the annex and distributed on shelves marked with tags to help the students locate their books.

"It's a darn efficient system that requires a minimum of handling," Cummings said.

The results of a recent study on [illegible] daughters indicate that certain DES associated reproductive abnormalities tend to decrease in severity with time and may eventually disappear.

The five year, follow up study was performed at Boston's Beth Israel Hospital on women who were exposed to DES in utero.

Dr. Howard Ehrlich [illegible] is a synthetic form of the hormone estrogen which has been taken by many women by women who were exposed particularly to the drug.

Dr. Ehrlich [illegible] said the implications of this type of study are a higher risk [illegible] daughter may, by the time she reaches her late twenties, be able to enter a "non-risk" population. [illegible] "high risk" women should undergo [illegible] to more frequent gynecological examinations for the early detection of possible cancer, Clapp said.

Considering observations during the five year period such survival rates [illegible] are encouraging, as CVS is [illegible] of cancer causing the cancer.

Survival study was found to decrease in three quarters of the DES women in whom it existed, and to disappear completely in 16 patients.

Physical Plant workers clear away the ice from the front of the Campus Center last week.

The many hassles of coping with winter

By DIANE KADZIS
Collegian Correspondent

Dealing with a cold winter is more than just a matter of bundling up for the Physical Plant. It involves keeping a close eye on thermostats, coal supplies, the weather forecast and a tight budget.

Despite the more common problems of frozen pipes, frost-covered roads, and watching the settings of more than 6,000 thermostats on campus, it's the power plant's coal supply which gets the closest scrutiny.

Theodore P. deLeedernier, chief utility engineer for the plant, said they have a [illegible] coal now but there is a [illegible] supplies including that in the upcoming expansion of the United Coal Mines contract in March.

He also said there are indications of a coal miners strike in the near future.

Although he did not foresee any heating problems at UMass, deLeedernier said an increasing need for conservation as the University because winters appear to be getting colder.

In steps toward conservation the plant is sending an energy coordinator around campus to watch thermostat settings, but it is nearly impossible to keep an eye on all of them, deLeedernier said.

The University must also be careful in their use of oil because of its high cost, deLeedernier said.

"Operating on oil would mean spending four million dollars more than we spend now, which is approximately four million," he said.

Physical Plant director George Norton said lowering the temperatures in unoccupied dormitories during intersession to save coal, increases both the chances of bursting pipes and the cost it takes to clean up the mess afterwards.

"Repair costs involve material and labor and the clean up. The avid costs are there," Norton said.

When a mild winter, such as last year's occurs, it is a blessing for the physical plant, he said. Roads do not have to be plowed as often, heating demands decrease and the warm weather allows other work to be done.

As a result of 1980's mild winter, Norton said they were able to buy much needed supplies and increase their inventory.

Additional work such as landscaping and ground work was made possible with the extra staff and funds, Norton said. The university always benefits from warm winters, but the remaining budget depends on the last snow fall.

Superstar musical to perform in April

By KATHERINE STONE
Collegian Correspondent

Jesus Christ Superstar, a rock musical by lyricist Lloyd Webber and Tim Rice, will be brought to Bowker auditorium this April by the University of Massachusetts Music Theatre Guild.

Directed by Gary Trahan and produced by Greg Driscoll, both Guild members, the show will feature actors, dancers and singers from throughout the five college area.

Guild shows are selected for audience appeal as well as affordability, Driscoll said. But the selection of Jesus Christ Superstar has been criticized by some people anticipating for the show because there is only one female role written into the script.

Driscoll said the Guild is trying to change this by adding females to the group of eight dancers and to the chorus of twenty-two dancers and singers.

The cast and crew for this production will rehearse Monday through Thursdays for three and a half hours a day and five hours on Sundays, said Driscoll. They will also stay through spring break, rehearsing from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. every day preparing for the opening on April 9. The show will run from the 9th to the 11th and the 16th, 17th and 18th. All performances will be at 8 p.m. Tickets prices will be announced.

Peeping tom seen lurking in windows of dormitory

A "peeping tom" was reported at 12:30 yesterday morning by two residents of the Gorman residence hall in the Central Residential Area. The peeping tom was allegedly looking into the bedroom windows on the south side of the dormitory, University of Massachusetts police said.

In another incident later that morning, Stephen Brighars, 21, of Brown residence hall in the Sylvan residential area, was taken into protective custody at 1:50 a.m. after police observed him swinging street signs around on North Pleasant Street. Police said he was released at 8:00 yesterday morning.

The front and back windshields of a 1976 Pontiac convertible were reported broken in Fraternity-Sorority Park Tuesday afternoon. UMass police said the incident apparently took place between February 6 and [illegible]. There are no suspects in the incident.

About $400 in jewelry was reported stolen from Cance residence hall in the Southwest residential area. Police said the incident apparently took place between December 15 and February 3. There are no suspects in the incident.

In another intersession incident, an estimated $150 worth of jewelry, clothing and a camera was reported missing from a MacKimmie residence hall room in the Southwest residential area. Police say the incident was reported Tuesday and the valuables were apparently taken sometime between December 20 and January 31.

In another incident a pocketbook costiang $27 was reported missing from the janitor's closet in the Whitmore Administration Building between 5 and 5:30 Tuesday afternoon, police said.

A wallet was reported stolen from the women's physical education building Tuesday at 7:45 a.m. Police said there was no money in the wallet and the woman called back in the afternoon to report that it had been returned to her.

State Rep. to visit UMass

State Rep. Nicholas Paleogos, D-Woburn, will pay a visit to the University of Massachusetts-Amherst campus today.

Paleogos is a member of the State House Education Committee and also a member of the House Committee on Hazardous Waste. He will be the guest of honor at a dinner with Chancellor Henry Koffler at the Campus Center. At the dinner, Paleogos will address UMass students who are residents of his Senate district and also plans to meet with UMass professors.

Paleogos plans to stay on the UMass campus until Friday. He will attend a showing of the musical "Aint Misbehavin" at the University's Fine Arts Center.

Publication provides link between SGA and students

The Student Advocate, a new Student Government Association publication, made its debut yesterday in the Campus Center distribution racks.

Funded and produced by the SGA Office of Communications, The Student Advocate will act as an informational link between the SGA and the University of Massachusetts student population, said Beth Segers, Director of the Office of Communications.

"The publication wasn't meant to be an alternative to the Collegian," Segers said.

Segers, a past news editor of the Collegian, described The Student Advocate as a consumer paper, providing valuable information students might not find in existing publications.

Review:

Follies performance proves disappointing

By JONATHAN HAMILTON
Collegian Staff

Like an old and tired prizefighter who throws punches but rarely scores with them so, too, was the performance of "Follies," Mount Holyoke College's Winter Term production held this past weekend at Chapin Auditorium. The script, written by James Goldman and the music and lyrics composed by Stephen Sondheim, were enough to please any crowd but clearly this audience, though polite, was not flocked by the cast in any way.

The production fell short in several aspects. First, the quality of the singing was suspect, which was not entirely the fault of the performers, for singing in Chapin Auditorium is a chore in itself. One actor was overheard saying, "Singing in Chapin is like singing in a barn." To further compound that was some inconsistent singing that was off-key. Perhaps most glaring was the flawed choreography. Most of the arrangements lacked fluidity while others were disorganized. Spacing and blocking were the culprits behind many of the marred dancing numbers.

The script itself is quite intriguing for it utilizes a flashback which in turn becomes a subplot within the main plot. Much of the story revolves around a cocktail party atmosphere where past loves and flings are recalled by two couples who are nearing their mid-life crises. Here they question each other's motives and comment on their present lives, as their younger counterparts interact on the stage right in front of them.

There were some fine exchanges between some of the actors. Most noteworthy was Phyllis Rogers Stone (Denise Bouton) who anchored the stage with some fine acting.

Conceivably, "Follies" could have been better if the supporting cast had been as funny and inspiring as Kevin the waiter (David Russell), who had a marvelous exchange with Ms. Bouton talking, flirting, and kissing her wetly on the cheek. But unfortunately there was less of this and more uninspiring work.

"Ben's Folly", the finale to the performance pretty much summed up the entire production. In it Ben (J. Peter McKearny) stumbles on the stage and drops his dancing stick as he realizes his life has been nothing more than a masquerade. His stumbling on the stage, though, mirrored the entire show for "Follies" was a disappointment from start to finish.

Recruitment rate up last year

WASHINGTON — Reenlistments and recruit quality, key measures of volunteer force effectiveness, improved significantly late last year, a Pentagon report showed yesterday.

Defense officials said they believe the sagging civilian economy was chiefly responsible for this in the last three months of 1980.

An 11.7 percent pay boost, which became effective last Oct. 1, probably helped convince more men and women already in service to sign up for another hitch, these officials said.

But they voiced doubt that the pay raise had much impact in attracting new volunteers because, they said, the raise had not yet been widely advertised during that quarter.

Funds give sight to Nicaraguans

JOSEPH BARRET
Collegian Staff

The Western Massachusetts Latin America Solidarity Committee is working in this area towards collecting eyeglasses for those in Nicaragua who need them.

David Russell, a spokesperson for the group, said the drive, sponsored by the United Steel Workers Union, was begun because volunteers teaching Nicaraguans to read found many to have poor eyesight.

"In the five month period of March to August last year, the illiteracy rate dropped from 52 percent to 12 percent. While the volunteers were doing this, they found that many illiteracy problems stemmed from poor eyesight. The Nicaraguan country is not a wealthy one like ours and many of these people could not afford glasses," Russell said.

"Since the revolution in 1979 (in which the Sandinistas overthrew the government of General Anastasio Somoza) the government sent some 150,000 volunteers to the country and greatly increased the literacy rate," Russell said.

He said a group of optometrists from the United States had volunteered to go down to Nicaragua and donate euipment, while also setting up prescriptions.

"I should add that this is also being sposored by the Catholic Diocese of Pittsburg, and those sponsoring this from the United States have pledged to raise 100,000 glasses this year."

The campaign, titled, "Eyeglasses for Nicaragua: Contribution to a Vision," has been hard at work because eyeglasses are difficult to get in Nicaragua, as the country assumed a large national debt when it took over and could not afford to undertake this goal itself, said Russell.

In Amherst there are collection boxes at the Jones Library, the Yellow Sun Food Coop, Logos Bookstore, at the University of Massachusetts Economics Department in Thompson Hall and the Latin America Solidarity Committee office in the UMass Student Union.

"I hope people will donate; with all the terrible violence and repression going on in Latin American area, with El Salvador and Guatemala and other trouble spots, this type of drive is something really hopeful to work towards," Russell said.

'Altered States': the makings of a winner

By ED LEVINE
Collegian Staff

A love story, a horror story, a science fiction yarn and a suspense thriller are all the ingredients of a winning movie and in the hands of master director Ken Russell, such a mixture becomes prime broth for more than a winning movie—it is the recipe for a masterpiece.

That's what Ken Russell has done to Paddy Chayefsky's story "Altered States." Russell took a book, written by the author of the "Network" screenplay, and turned it into a mindblowing orgy of the sensations of sight, sound and emotion.

"Altered States" is a horror story, a love story, and a science fiction and suspense thriller all rolled into one. And Ken Russel's unique style of filming and casting—which is difficult to explain unless you've seen one of his flicks—is perfectly suited to this type of film.

The story starts at Columbia University in New York City, where a noted doctor and professor of physiology, Eddie Jessup (portrayed by William Hurt), is experimenting with "sensory deprivation", floating inside a coffin-like contraption known as an isolation tank. Witha large bubble over his head which is connected to various heart and brain wave monitors, Jessup floats in the heated tank of water mixed with a solution that provides buoyancy. The result is like being in the void of space—one feels, sees and hears nothing.

While in the tank, Jessup begins to hallucinate or "trip," to use the drug culture vernacular. He talks to his assistant, Arthur Rosenberg (Bob Balaban), telling him of his visions of religion and his fathers' death.

Soon the scene switches to Rosenberg's apartment, where a brilliant, beautiful, young anthropologist, Emily (Blair Brown) listens to Rosenberg describe the nutty but brilliant Dr. Jessup. When Jessup arrives, Emily is instantly attracted to him, as Russell so vividly shows by presenting the physiologist standing in a doorway at the end of a long corridor, bathed from behind with blinding white light.

Needless to say, Eddie and Emily hit it off and, after a short walk around campus, head back to her living room sofa-bed. There, in the midst of sex, Jessup begins to rehallucinate and bares his soul to Emily, telling her of his father's death and his lack of religious faith.

The film then switches to Boston's Beacon Hill (one of the only two recognizable shots of the Boston area in the film) where Eddie and Emily, now with a couple of kids, have been living not-so-happily for several years while teaching and studying at Harvard. We learn they are contemplating a divorce, with Emily about to take off on an expedition to Africa with the kids and Eddie moving to a Cambridge apartment.

As this is shown, Athur Rosenberg and his wife arrive from New York and Jessup's interest in isolation tanks is rekindled. Rosenberg almost reluctantly agrees to try the experiments again in an isolation tank Jessup had found in the basement of a Harvard laboratory.

Jessup also has another idea. His interest in altered states of consciousness now full blown (as evidenced earlier in the film where he is shown working with schizophrenics), Jessup takes a trip to Mexico to try an exotic hallucinogenic mushroom mixture eaten regularly by the local Indian tribe.

In a brilliantly filmed and haunting scene, Russell presents the audience with the ghoulish faces of Indians, their aged faces caked with dried mud, sipping a broth of mushrooms mixed with blood from Jessup's hand; then Jessup himself takes the elixir and embarks on a fireworks-filled trip into as yet unexplored regions of his consciousness. A lizard appears, which then turns into a statue-like vision of Emily, which is soon covered with sand. And, when it is all over, Jessup finds it hard to believe the Indians' claim that he, with his bare hands, killed and ate the lizard.

Jessup returns to Boston and then decides to mix the mushroom concoction with the isolation tank. The result, almost impossibly, is both terrifying and comical.

Throughout the remainder of the film, the love story between Emily and Eddie re-emerges and the psychedelic experiences get wilder, louder and more visual. Russell employs a variety of cinematic techniques—including an "Alien" like surprise appearance by the "creature" (a.k.a. Jessup) and a strange, totally terrifying effect of Jessup, now consumed by the raw energy of his mind, melting and shimmering amidst a whirlpool of a foam-like substance.

To reveal any more of the film would not do it justice. Parts are genuinely terrifying, some almost comical, most ideas semi-believable and still others which seem totally implausable. But Russell mixes the different moods well. As the audience is held in check by a terrifying, if not confusing scene, Russell drops them like a rock, providing comic relief in the form of Dr. Mason Parrish (Charles Haid) the chief of physiology at Harvard Medical School.

With a story which seems confusing and nearly impossible to do justice on film, Russell succeeds, presenting a truly entertaining show with real characters acting in real ways to things they don't, and may never understand.

Apparently, however, something happened to the film which author Chayefsky did not appreciate. He ordered his name removed from the credits as screenwriter and had it replaced with the pseudonym "Sidney Aaron," for reasons best known to him. The dialogue follows the book nearly verbatim and one can only speculate that it is the hallucinations that he took objection to.

Presented in Boston's Sack Cinema, or in the Sack Palace in Springfield, on the wide screen with something called "70mm megasound," (called, in the advertisements "a revolutionary new concept in the sensation of sound,") the film takes on its full eerie proportions. But, seen again in a "normal" theater at the Hampshire Mall, the movie doesn't lose much. The added, booming sound and wide screen add a remarkable touch, but this film is so good, so well produced, that it can be enjoyed and appreciated by anyone, anywhere.

Unusual sculpture comes to University Gallery

Jud Nelson
University Gallery, Feb. 6-Mar. 20

By SUSAN BARON
Collegian Staff

The sculpture of Jud Nelson will be featured at the University Gallery in the Fine Arts Center through March 20 and one should take advantage of the opportunity to view this man's work and message.

Nelson's sculpture is modeled after consumer objects such as Wonder Bread, a Flow-thru Teabag, and, yes, even a Toilet Paper Roll. Sounds pretty commercial? Well Nelson's work is meant to convey that theme.

Stark white and flawlessly accurate, Nelson's art leaves little to the imagination. It is the art of "seeing" that Nelson masters. It is the abundance of plastic and materialism in our society that Nelson works with.

From 1968 to 1978, Nelson carved Styrofoam. With saws, razors, toothpicks and sandpaper, Nelson replicated a pair of boots and sunglasses, a mousetrap, a teabag and a chair. They lay on their pedestals in the exhibit; as meaningless, motionless and man made as they appear on a shelf in a supermarket.

Before realizing the significance of Jud Nelson's work, one might consider his art ironically unoriginal. After all, Nelson will spend up to nine months recreating an object that's produced in seconds in a factory. What's the point?

According to Nelson, the point lies in the fact that even birds have to build their nests out of plastic. We live in a society

EDITORIAL/OPINION

Eight days in Bali

President Reagan's choice of William P. Clark as Deputy Secretary of State was ridiculed today in a number of foreign newspapers...Mr. Clark's admissions to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that he did not know the names of the Prime Ministers of South Africa and Zimbabwe, and his apparently thin grasp of foreign policy in general, has attracted publicity...
—New York Times, February 5

"This session of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee will now come to order. Mr. Clark..."
"Please, call me Bill, Senator."

Bob Conte

"Bill, you wouldn't mind removing your sunglasses, would you? And can somebody see about getting him a jacket and tie? Come on Bill, the networks are gonna be here."

"Extra long on those sleeves, okay? I'll take a nice light cotton double breasted if you got it."

"Light cotton in February?! Bill, how inappropriate! Mrs. Reagan isn't going to like this one bit."

"It's business, Senator. I have to catch a flight for Aruba as soon as you guys confirm me."

"So you intend to begin your official duties immediately upon confirmation?"

"Of course, sir. There's been some talk about an Aruban beach sand embargo to our country. My researchers doubt claims of declining reserves, so my girlfriend and I intend to inspect each and every beach on the island in pursuit of the truth. Our brochure says it may take as many as twelve days and eleven nights but, by God, we're going to go for it, sir!"

"I'm impressed, Bill."

"Thank you Senator. This is just the beginning of my revolutionary concept of Alphabetic Diplomacy. It's gonna be the rage of the '80s, sir. I feel it is high time this great nation began paying attention to our less powerful friends in the lower income areas of the world, like the Caribbean and South Pacific, for example. Toward this end, I intend to visit each and every friendly warm weather republic this winter, impoverished or not, as one man's attempt to restore Old Glory's sagging prestige overseas. You know, a lot of countries don't like us, sir."

"So I hear. Damn shame!"

"Anyway, we're going to travel in alphabetical order, so as to avoid embarrassing diplomatic snubs that have plagued previous administrations. After Aruba we have a weekend in the Azores, then eight days in Bali..."

"Eight days?"

"The Balines are going all out, sir. They've never had a Deputy Scretary of State there before. I don't go anywhere without a red carpet under my feet and a lei on my chest. Pardon the pun, sir. Besides, the natives need something to do."

"But eight days?"

"It's all planned! I couldn't ask them to cancel anything, Senator. They've worked so hard..."

"Eight days!!!!?"

"Alright, I guess the dinner with the governor can go. But the windsurfing tournament stays. I'll have to insist on that, sir."

"Fair enough."

"Thank you, Senator. I expect the trip to be extremely beneficial to the national interest. I figure that by the time we get to Zanzibar in early June the entire vacation belt will be safely on our side of the fence. We plan to go pretty heavy on the propaganda. The natives are pretty gullible, sir. A lot of them still think that our streets are paved with gold."

"Aren't they?"

"Not since the twenties, sir."

"Now, Bill, there are two important questions that must be clarified before we can confirm your nomination. First, how is your relationship with Secretary of State Haig?"

"We understand each other. Just yesterday he told me to stay the hell out of his way or else he'd blow my guts away with an M-16. I can respect that."

"Oh, don't listen to him. Haig says that to everybody. He's just a bully. Second, is it true that you cannot name the Prime Ministers of South Africa and Zimbabwe?

"Well, Senator, those allegations of my nonknowledge of the identities of the aforementioned prime ministers are in no way indicative of my awareness and experience in the formulation and perpetuation of our right thinking foreign policies in dealing with such wrong thinking nations and I do in fact refute them sharply and most very definitely at this particular point in time."

"Say, you're pretty good, Bill."

"It wasn't too verbose, was it?"

"Hell no. Consider yourself confirmed. Say, when you get to Mozambique I'd like you to look up this little girl I met in the war..."

Sent a card, but it was hard

Some people take Valentine's Day as an opportunity to let their sweetheart know how much they really care. Others mope around because they don't have one, or they don't like the one they do have, or the one they have is giving them such a hard time about the other one who only comes over on Thursday nights that the day is wasted on torpid guilt.

Eric Janszen

Then there are those who don't put much stock in the emotional significance of VD day, who choose to affirm their caring and dedication and so forth at those times when they happen to feel particularly caring and dedicated and so forth, like when they're drunk, rather than on an arbitrary date set by some Roman saint and profited off of by greeting card manufacturers.

But there are yet others, the ones who hate Valentine's Day.

And why do they hate Valentine's Day—an occasion of warmth and fondness—you ask? Because they aren't little kids anymore. Because they aren't still in elementary school where they scrawled on yellow paper those anonymous confessions of forbidden wishes in crayons red and blue. Where Jackie knew who put the card in her desk by the way a goofy uneven smile would drop onto Robbie's face like a noodle onto a bowl of tepid soup when he looked up at her passing.

No, it's more involved than that now. Now they have to sign the cards they send. Worse, their message must be full of the meanings earlier innocence left unstirred. They have to be poetic; and they have to be careful, show discretion, yet not encumber feelings with insecurities.

Despite themselves, they write things like this:

Dear Betty,
Happy Valentine's Day,
I like you in a neat way,
So stay.

Love,
Mike

and this:

Dear Mark,
You may think I'm being stupid
For thinking I see cupid,
Like I think you're being
A dork for disagreeing.

Love,
Peggy

and this:

Dear Jon,
Mary was a little girl,
Her hair was white as snow.
And everywhere that Mary went,
Her hair was sure to go.
But then she cut and dyed her hair,
And changed her name to Joe.
(Take a hike, buck-o)

Sincerely,
Mary

I too longing for those chaste and blameless days offer this:

My Little Lambchop,

In city love I claim
To pressure easements, though restrain
The eyes that see the pigeons taking flight,
Ears that hear the trolleys squeeling in the night.
Turnstile love, no tokens remit,
Stuck outside the gates I sit
And wait reposed, my heart churning,
Oh seething fate! for your returning.

Handicap awareness is necessary

I would like to compliment the coordinators of the Handicap Awareness program that was held on Tuesday. I feel that handicap awareness is necessary around the campus not only because a handicapped individual faces many structural barriers, but attitudinal barriers as well.

Handicap programs such as these are vital to a community like UMass since so many handicapped students benefit from these services.

Simple examples of obstacles faced by handicapped people, such as a telephone pole in the middle of a ramp designed for wheelchairs or the numerous problems with our newly renovated handicap dormitory, go unnoticed because of the lack of handicap awareness.

I hope that people will recognize the problems that do exist for handicapped people and, at least, the problems on this campus.

where the availability of plastic is unavoidable. Hence Jud Nelson's use of Styrofoam in his art.

Since 1978 though, Nelson has progressed from this pessimistic "plastic society" to a more optimistic society which he labels as the "Space Age Renaissance." Symbolic of this Renaissance is Nelson's recent work with marble.

Although tougher to work with than Styrofoam, Nelson enjoys the natural, non-polluting and sensual aspects of marble. With tremendous talent and sensitivity, Nelson has "molded" a solid substance like marble into a crinkle in a piece of paper, a thread in a shoe and an air bubble in a slice of bread. He is truly amazing.

Nelson's favorite work is his most recent sculpture of toilet paper. In an age where artists seem caught up in creativity and "originality" it's interesting to find an artist who strives for holistic and super-realist precision. Nelson's work is solely reductive, not additive.

When asked what he plans for the future, Nelson commented on his present project—a Hefty Bag carved from 40000 pounds of marble. Apparently it's already down to 1500 pounds.

★DES

CVH was found to diminish in half of the women in whom it existed, and to disappear comepletely in 28 percent.

Women with abnormalities originally, experience diminution of both.

The report of the study, published in the American Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology, states "Although ectopy occurs in non-DES exposed women, it is much more frequent in the exposed group; by contrast, CVH has almost never been described in non-DES exposed patients."

The authors conclude that "lesions considered characteristic of DES exposure are unstable phenomona subject to self-eradication over time." They suggest these findings will alow researchers to determine what factors influence the changes. A future study might examine the influence of contraceptive use on the process of devolution.

In 1971, an article in the New England Journal of Medicine reported that estrogen products can be cancer producing in humans. The risk of cancer of the vagina or cervix in DES exposed females is approximately 1 in 1,000 through age 24. Peak ages of risk occur between the ages of 14 through 19, a pamphlet published by the University Health Service states.

According to the book, Women and the Crisis in Sex Hormones, DES was prescribed to pregnant women from the 1940's to the 1970's. There the current use of DES is primarily as a "morning after pill" to prevent pregnancy after unprotected intercourse, originally it was thought to prevent miscarriage. (The University Health services currently prescribes a non-DES morning after pill.)

Moped speed increase sought

BOSTON (AP) — As the rising price of gasoline spurs more drivers to resort to mopeds, owners and dealers want to change Massachusetts law so the power bikes can be driven faster.

Rep. Nicholas Costello, D—Amesbury, presented the moped case yesterday to the Legislature's Public Safety Committee. He wants Massachusetts law amended so that it will match moped statutes in New Hampshire and most other states.

The change would allow Bay State mopeds to have two horsepower engines, instead of their present 1½, and permit higher speeds — 30 mph instead of 25.

Costello said the higher speed capability would enhance moped safety because it would enable them to maneuver better in car traffic.

Motor Vehicle Registrar Richard H. McLaughlin supported the change, but with a condition. He wanted to see moped riders required to wear a helmet.

McLaughlin said he was concerned about the increasing number of crashes involving the state's 30,000 motorized bicycles. Last year, he said, mopeds were involved in five traffic fatalities and nearly 500 injuries.

Some committee members predicted that moped drivers would not be content with a 30 mph speed, but would push for even higher limits in the future. However, dealers and riders insisted that no one in the moped industry wants more power than 30.

★Sinatra

In three hours of testimony, Sinatra denied he was a member of the Mafia or ever received illegal money.

Sinatra conceded that he had met the late Chicago Mafia boss Sam "Momo" Giancana on several occasions and had played golf with him at Palm Springs, Calif., but he said there had never been a business deal between them and emphatically denied he was fronting for Giancana.

In announcing the decision, board Chairman Richard Bunker said there had been some questionable activity on Sinatra's part.

"I am not suggesting he has been a saint by any means, but in the areas we have investigated, we have not found any substantive reason he should not be granted a license. In the gaming business, we are not going to have a group of choir boys."

The hearing was conducted at City Hall in downtown Las Vegas, far from the smoke and disaster of the city's second major hotel fire in less than three months. Eight people died in the Tuesday night fire at the Las Vegas Hilton.

Giancana came up in connection with Sinatra's ownership of the Cal-Neva Lodge in Lake Tahoe, which Giancana had visited in 1963 — the principal reason Sinatra lost his gaming license.

"I never invited Mr. Giancana to come to Cal-Neva Lodge," Sinatra said. "I never entertained him and I never saw him."

Arsonists blamed in Vegas fire

By STEPHEN FOX
Associated Press

LAS VEGAS, Nev. — In a fiery flashback to the inferno that killed 84 people at the MGM Grand Hotel less than three months ago, four fires — all believed set by arsonists — sent suffocating smoke billowing through the giant Las Vegas Hilton. The toll yesterday stood at eight dead and 198 injured.

Police and hotel security searched all 2,783 rooms in the nation's largest hotel for five hours Wednesday morning, looking under beds and in closets and checking some rooms four times. No additional bodies were found, authorities said.

Seven victims died of smoke inhalation Tuesday night, and the eighth fell or leaped to his death, landing on an outside deck, according to Clark County Coroner Otto Ravenholt.

Among those admitted to hospitals was singer Natalie Cole, who had sung at the hotel Monday night and was overcome by smoke in her room. Six people were reported in critical condition, including one firefighter.

The main blaze, which gutted the eighth and ninth floors of the hotel's east wing, started at 8:07 p.m. Tuesday. The fire shattered a huge window on the eighth floor and allowed flames to funnel up the side of the hotel, hopscotching floors all the way to the roof and blackening the outside of the building.

Three smaller fires, on the second, third and ninth floors, were discovered in the same wing within 45 minutes. Authorities said all the fires were of "suspicious origin."

One of the fires sent a blowtorch of flame up an elevator shaft to the roof where dozens of guests had fled to await rescue by helicopter.

"When we got to the roof, we saw flames coming up the shaft through the building," said Joseph Adolf, a conventioneer from Chicago, who was staying on the 29th floor. "We ran over to the other side of the roof. When we saw flames there, we started to get nervous."

Army general approved as Poland prime minister

WARSAW, Poland (AP) — Army general Wojciech Jaruzelski was formally approved as prime minister by the Polish Parliament yesterday to provide what party chief Stanislaw Kania called the best leadership at a time "when the black clouds of danger are over Poland."

Jaruzelski, who retains his post as minister of defense, immediately issued a communique to Poland's armed forces noting his dual roles and pledging that Poland's armed forces, "in brotherhood of arms with the Warsaw pact allies," would guarantee a Socialist Poland.

Jaruzelski, 57, is a four-star general and Soviet-trained career military man. The party's Central Committee on Monday nominated him to replace Jozef Pinkowski, who became prime minister in a government shakeup during last summer's nationwide strikes.

AP Laserphoto

Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski

The appointment of Jaruzelski, who has been minister of defense for 12 years and appeared before Parliament in full uniform, was seen as a message of reassurance to the Soviets and other Warsaw pact allies. They have been sharply critical of the independent trade unions formed after last summer's strikes and have accused some union leaders and dissident advisers of staging a "frontal attack" on the Polish Communist party.

The criticism and the massing of Soviet troops along Poland's borders have raised fears in the West that the Kremlin might intervene in Poland as it did in Czechoslovakia in 1968 following a period of economic and social upheaval there.

★ Big Green rolls

Westwood, Mass. native Ann Deacon started shooting the eyes out this defensive alignment.

UMass was forced to come out to cover Deacon and Amy Nelson (10 points, 19 rebounds) and Koziara began to go to work inside, following up shots, laying them in and drawing the fouls off of Julie and Martha Ready. Dartmouth built up an eith point lead, 24-16, at 5:07 on another Deacon swish and the Green never looked back. Two Koziara free throws at 1:21 made it 27-17 and Deacon hit a scoop at the buzzer increasing the lead to 12.

UMass battled back somewhat in the second half, largely due to the efforts of Amherst freshman Nadine Jackson who played at full speed for the entire game, grabbing 12 tough rebounds and scoring seven points. She played outstanding defense on Dartmouth's Deacon limiting her to just three secon half points.

"I was pleased with Nadine's play tonight," Ozdarski said. "She showed a lot of hustle and played one of her best games so far this year."

Tricia Corcoran came in to the game halfway through the second period and hit two quck jumpers to cut the Big Green's lead to eight again, 42-34, but this wasn't enough as Koziara started to heat up offensively and resumed her attack on the blackboard.

Dartmouth didn't shoot well either last night (23 of 68) but it was better than what UMass threw up and the shot selection was much better. The most important factor in the game was that they never gave, from start to finish. If they maintain this attitude, maybe they'll be able to break the slump and carry it over into the playoffs.

DARTMOUTH (58) Amy Nelson 4-2-10, Ann Deacon 8-3-19, Gayle Koziara 7-6-20, Eileen Crane 0-0-0, Joah Carroll 0-0-0, Kim Selmore 1-0-2, Cindy Vance 2-1-7, Corinne Reyes 0-1-1. Totals 23-12-58.

ting to affect them mentally. It's a five-game season now, and the girls simply have to believe in themselves."

There is little doubt that this team believes in itself. What stands out most during this slump of slumps is that there seems to be a lack of genuine alarm.

"I don't think the team is really down," says Kathy Christopher, the UMass manager, who knows as much about the team's attitude as anyone. "They're taking every game like it's a new day. That's all you can do."

While most of the players have said they are handling the slump well, Ozdarski doesn't deny that it has taken a toll on her team.

"They've got to be down," Ozdarski says. "This has been hard. But they've got to pick themselves up. This is a mental thing now. They're physically tired and it's star-

There are five new days left, culminating with the lat new day at Boston University, Feb. 27, which could very well determine supremacy in New England women's basketball. And anyone who knows this team knows they'll be back.

Someone patted Julie Ready on the back last night. "Suck it in, kid. You guys will be all right."

"Oh, I know," Julie Ready said, as if there never was a question about the matter in the first place. "I know we will."

The UMass WOMEN'S SOFTBALL TEAM is conducting tryouts February 11 and 12 at NOPE Gym from 5:30 to 7:30. All are welcome to attend.

Entries for the intramural wrestling tournament are due in the intramural office today. Health forms are required for entry so if you are not yet cleared through the IM office, this must be tended to to be eligible for competition. There will be a formal weigh-in prior to the scheduling of matches. Participants will be notified about the date and time for the weigh-in. Matches will begin on Monday, February 23 and will be held in the wrestling room.

Men's Women's INTRAMURAL BOWLING entries are due by Friday, February 13, with a non-refundable prepayment. Entry forms and questions should be referred to Ray Pollard in the bowling alley 545-2330. This is a 10 week league starting on Feb. 18.

COREC BOWLING entries are due in the intramural office by Wednesday, February 25, with a non refundable pre payment. This is a one night total pin fall event.

The Collegian is accepting applications for the position of co-sports editor. Anyone interested should see Rob Stein at the office.

★ Hoopmen

"If you take in all aspects of the game, he (Harris) is the best I've ever had in my ten years here," NU head coach Jim Calhoun said, "He is carrying on a legacy. He's never played on a losing team."

There is a local interest who is also a major factor in Northeastern's success this season. Junior Perry Moss, of Amherst, is averaging close to 20 points a game while providing an ideal backcourt mate to Harris. When the opposition's defense is drawn to Harris, a prolific shooter, Moss is usually left open for the easy jumper when Harris dishes off to him. Moss is also an excellent passer who might challenge Harris' assist mark before he graduates.

UMass played perhaps their best basketball of the season in the first half of Tuesday's game against Rutgers. Edwin Green put on a stellar performance. If the Minutemen hope to stay in the game with the Huskies, they will certainly have to equal that level of play in Boston. A lot will depend on how UMass' guards handle Harris and Moss. Bill Bayno and captain Ron Washington have been playing some outstanding "D" as of late and it just might get interesting in Cabot Gym tonight.

Skiers take conference

By JOHN GARDINIER
Collegian Correspondent

On Sunday and Monday of this week the UMass men's ski team captured their thirteenth consecutive New England Intercollegiate Ski Conference (NEISC) Division title at Loon Mt., N.H. in a dramatic comeback victory. After falling behind Plymouth State in a slalom loss on Sunday, the team came back to sweep both giant slalom races on Monday to take the title.

"It didn't look good for us after the slalom on Sunday, because Plymouth State skis giant slalom better," coach Bill MacConnel said. "They train at a big mountain (Waterville Valley) and that really helps giant slalom. The next day everyone on the team skied great and we were able to pull it out. I don't think anybody was more surprised than we were."

Sunday's slalom saw UMass skiers Paul Suozzo (1st), Bob Grout, Scott Billings, and Tony Kundert finish in the top ten of the six team meet, but Plymouth State's depth gave them the edge needed to insure the victory. UMass' chances for a win were hampered when top skier Brian Prindle experienced his only fall of the season.

Going into Monday's races Plymouth State needed to win only one of two giant slalom events to break UMass' impressive string of league titles.

UMass squeaked by Plymouth in the first event, winning by just over a second. Doug Karworski of Plymouth finished first in the race followed by UMass' Prindle and Suozzo. Chris Wakefield and Grout finished in the top ten as well, to give UMass the win. Plymouth and UMass were now deadlocked in the race for the title with one event remaining.

Prindle again came through in the clutch with a first place finish in the season finale. The win enabled the Minutemen to chalk up their thirteenth consecutive divisional title. Kundert, Suozzo, and Wakefield again provided the consistency that MacConnell has stressed throughout the season.

Swimmers drown UNH, 74-39

By ANNA ROELL
Collegian Correspondent

Last night, Minutemen swimmers took their second straight victory this week, sweeping the University of New Hampshire 74-39. Boyden pool was sparsely scattered with spectators who made it through the rain to see the UMass men bring their record up to 3-5.

Sweeps were the action for the night as the team left the UNH (3-7) swimmers in their wake. UMass men got off to a bad start when the 400 medley relay team was disqualified by a false start by sophmore Howard Abramson. The next event,1000 yd. freestyle, brought the swimmers right back into play when Mickey Minutoli and Mike Boucher took first and second consecutively with times of 10:52.46 and 10:55.29, and injured man Jack Fuchs brought in a close fourth for his first meet back in the water.

The 50 freestyle, 200 backstroke, and the 200 breastroke were all taken one and two by the hyped UMass swimmers. Brian Spellman and Steve Samuels swam the freestyle with times of 22.24 and 22.9. The backstroke sweep was taken by Seth LaChance and Phil Surette, with times of 2:13.52 and 2:15.28.200 breastroke one and two were won by Tom Lowery and Surette, with excellent times of 2.22.64 and 2:25.59.

One and three meter springboard diving were both won by UMass senior Dan Anthony with scorees of 251 and 217. John McCurdy and John Findley also dove for UMass, with McCurdy placing third on 3 meter.

UNH coach Frank Helies, thought the meet was going to be close, "usually within 15 points against UMass." "An all around great performance was psarked by the return of Jack Fuchs and the announcing of the injured Dave Swenson," coach Russ Yarworth said. UNH was missing their backstroker and one printer due to academic responsibilities and Helies predicetd "It is definitely going to hurt our chances. We only have one backstroker."

The final event, the freestyle relay, polished off the big victory for UMass taking first with a time of 3:15.58 and the 3 divers joining in the swimming competition as the third relay team.

After last night's performance, the Amherst meet next week can guarrantee another exciting competition, especially if Yarworth concludees the meet with his personal event of 3 meter diving (fully clothed).

Bob DeConinck, co-captain of the UMass swim team, freestyles his way through the water during last night's meet against U.N.H. UMass won, 74-39.

UMass guard Tricia Corcoran wrestles away the ball from Dartmouth's Cindy Vaios during last night's game at the Cage.

Big Green rolls, Mass drops third

Koziara 20 points, 30 rebs, leads charge

By STEPHEN FREKER
Collegian Staff

The scoring drought which first began to grip the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team two games ago in Springfield and continued to grow this past Saturday at Northeastern's Cabot Gym is rapidly approaching the point where the classification of this strange phenomonon could change from drought to blizzard.

The women cagers could manage only a paltry .250 shooting percentage (19 of 75) in dropping their third straight to a surging Dartmouth squad, 58-44, last night at Curry Hicks.

UMass, whose overall record dropped to 12-10, played adequate defense on this pretty solid Green team, but they couldn't sink a bucket when it would have counted throughout the entire game.

"This has been going on for two and a half games now," head coach Mary Ann Ozdarski said. "If we don't score, we can't win. It' as simple as that."

Ozdarski tried a new starting lineup in this game, both Julie and Martha Ready began the game, but this change did not equalize the overwhelming performance put on by Dartmouth junior Gayle Koziara.

It is very easy to see how Koziara was the top rebounder in the nation last year and is close to the top this season with a 15.8 rebound per game average. When she wanted a board last night, she just muscled her way in and grabbed it. Granted, the referees were allowing a lot of extracurricular activities go under the hoop, but still Koziara was a marvel to watch underneath.

"It was pretty physical under there tonight. "Koziara, who finished the game with 30 (!) rebounds to go along with her 20 points and 7 dinner tickets which she was gracious enough to hand out to several UMass players, said, 'It was a little bit more than I'm used to and the refs didn't help too much either, but it went both ways so I'm not complaining."

"Koziara had an outstanding game," Ozdarski said "you won't see a better individual effort in a while that will match what she did out there tonight."

Although this may sound hard to believe, Koziara could have scored 40 and got 40 rebounds and the UMass cagers still could have pulled it off if only they had hit a few more shots.

Massachusetts came out at the beginning of the game and went right at the Green. They led 12-8 at the halfway point of the period and were playing a tough zone defense keyed by the hustling play of guards Sherry Collins and Nadine Jackson. They weren't letting much through the middle and were getting away with the zone until

They'll be back

By KEVIN CULLEN

Julie Ready came out of one of those dismal chambers they call locker rooms down at Curry Hicks Cage 1st night. For the third time in the last week, Julie Ready and her University of Massachusetts teammates had lost a basketball game.

She wasn't smiling.

"How are you feeling?" someone asked.

"Up here?" Julie Ready asked back, pointing to her head.

Up there is where it is starting to hurt. UMass dropped its third consecutive game, 58-44, to Dartmouth last night and things aren't rosy anymore. At the beganning of last week, UMass was 12-7 with plans to win their remaining seven games to grab a place in the top four seeds in the Eastern regionals, ensuring an opening round game at the Cage.

There will be no opening round game at the Cage this year.

The slide began last Tuesday, with a 66-64 loss to Springfield, followed by a 59-42 beating at the hands of Northeastern. Last night capped one of the least memorable weeks in recent years for UMass women's basketball.

And, for UMass fans, the question is, are they all right up there?

"No one is really down," says freshman guard Jenny Gray. "We've just got to play ourselves out of the slump. There's really not a lot you can do when the shots aren't falling, and they're just not falling for us lately."

Gray's is an understatement. February has been less than an endearing month for UMass, as they've shot colder than the weather. At Springfield, UMass shot just 37 percent. At Northeastern, it dipped to 29 percent, and last night hit rock bottom—19-for-75, or 25 percent. All this from a team which had been averaging 74 points a game.

"You can not shoot the way we've been shooting and expect to win ball games," UMass head coach Mary Ann Ozdarski said, shaking her head as she looked at the stat sheet after last night's game. "It's that simple."

It is that simple, but solving the problem isn't. Ready, the team's leading scorer, has been off, but just how much of that is due to physical problems isn't clear.

"I feel all right," says Ready, who is bothered by a stress fracture in her foot. "I've just got to play better than I have been lately."

UM spikers drop first of year to Albany State, in five games

By RANDY J. MARCUS
Collegian Staff

It could have gone either way but unfortunately it went the way of Albany State as they snuck by the UMass men's team 15-12, 13-15, 10-15, 15-13, 15-12 last night at NOPE gymnasium.

"This is the first real competition that we've had."
—coach Al Morel

"We had them in the fifth game 12-7, but we just didn't put them away," coach Al Morel said, "This is the first real competition that we've had. BU and BC wern't bad but we killed them," he said.

"The problem with this match is that we didn't pass well and you can't run the middle, which is our bread and butter without good passing."

In the final tie-breaking game, UMass was behind 6-1 and pulled ahead to give Albany State a run for their money. But the Great Danes didn't succomb and managed to spike their way to a win.

All through the match, tough defense was shown by Steve Geryk and Jack Chandler. Co-Captain Pat Ryan gave his usual display of expertise in his setting, but that wasn't enough.

Morel substituted Dave Marteney in on numerous occassions to put his strong, consistent serve. Marteney showed he could be depended on serving up aces when they were needed.

This weekend, the Minutemen travel to Boston to meet MIT and Northeastern Saturday and Sunday respectively.

"Northeastern is tough and we're not going to take MIT too lightly either. I'm hoping the team can take out their frustrations from this game (Albany State) this weekend."

Last night was the team's first loss of the season, they are now 2-1.

Hoopmen at Northeastern, Harris tries for 2000

By STEPHEN FREKER
Collegian Staff

The 1980-81 winter athletic season has been one of rejuvenation for anyone associated with Northeastern University sports.

The Husky hockey team has been rated near the top in all of the national polls all season and for a good reason. Northeastern's icemen are sporting their best ECAC record (13-4) in 20 years. Except for a recent slump in which they have dropped a few big games, the Huskies have been pretty consistent with their crowd-pleasing, winning hockey.

Witness the fact that they have transformed the Boston Arena, before this season a rat-ridden relic, into a major hockey hotbed. The week before the Beanpot Tourney, NU played Boston College and Boston University on consecutive nights. Sellout crowds stuffed themselves into the Arena and NU security guards were forced to turn hundreds away from the gate. Unheard of in Northeastern hockey history.

About half a mile down Huntington Avenue, inside NU's Cabot Gymnasium, it's been much the same story. The basketball Huskies, who will meet the University of Massachusetts Minutemen within these same confines this evening at 7:30, currently sit atop the ECAC North conference with a 15-5 overall record.

NU basketball has traditionally been in the black in terms of wins. Since 1960, Northeastern has only had two losing seasons. For the past four tours of duty, the winning ways can be attributed to the efforts of senior guard Pete Harris.

"Too often commentators, coaches, and teammates go overboard in issuing platitudes on behalf of outstanding players. To many times the phrase "do-it-all" is used in describing such a player. But, when Harris is the player in question, this title is quite appropriate.

Harris can score points. If he has a good night against UMass tonight (he needs 34 points) he can go ove the 2000 point career scoring mark, becoming the second Hub hoop player (Ray Buckland of Boston State did it last week) this season to do so. Harris can also dish off to his teammates if need be. He is second among NU's alltime assist leaders.

The 6'1" Harris is also a leaper. He is president of the card-carrying members of the Rise Club's Huntington Ave. Annex. This select group includes Roxbury's Chip Rucker, who is leading Division One in rebounding at 6'8", Dave Laito, who is the team's second leading boardworker and 6'7" Steve Jefferson who is the premier powerdunker on this well-balanced Husky squad.

Koffler gives mixed signals on Boston-Amherst split

University of Massachusetts at Amherst Chancellor Henry Koffler towed the official university line and came out in support of keeping the UMass-Boston campus in the UMass tri-campus system yesterday at the first Faculty Senate meeting of the semester.

But in his address to the senate, Koffler went on to list a half dozen reasons why the UMass-Amherst campus would benefit if its board of trustees was separate from that of the UMass-Boston campus, which is likely be be merged with Boston State College in the near future. The issue of a separate trusteeship for the proposed merged Boston institution has sparked controversy on both UMass campuses.

Koffler told the faculty senators that UMass President David C. Knapp is committed to keeping the Boston campus in the UMass system.

"I support this position," said Koffler.

But, Koffler then said a separate UMass Board of trustees would be able to concentrate more closely on the welfare of the Amherst campus, which he called the flagship institution of the stage.

He also said separation would enable UMass-Amherst to organize its alumni support for its own campus, rather than a tri-campus system. Alumni development has been one of Koffler's top priorities since he took office a year and a half ago.

Knapp, who administers UMass-Boston, UMass-Amherst, and the UMass-Worcester Medical School could not be reached for comment last night.

Opponents of separation have said the Amherst campus would lose valuable political clout if its Boston ties were broken. But Koffler said that over 9,000 of UMass-Amherst's 25,000 undergraduate students are from the Boston area.

Koffler concluded by stating, "It is clear that the Amherst campus has a distinct role in state higher education." He said he would act in the "best way I know how to preserve the Amherst campus."

Most of the faculty senators who spoke after the Chancellor were in favor of separation from a mergered Boston institution. Professor Robert Dyer, of the classics department, said he is confident that Amherst administrators, faculty, and students can make their presence known in Boston without the ties provided by the UMass-Boston campus.

Dyer concluded: "We do understand that Chancellor Koffler cannot jeopordize his position by speaking out (in favor of separation). I'm sure he does so privately."

The final decision on the status of UMass-Boston rests with the state's Board of Regents, which will take control of all state institutions of higher education on March 1.

At a meeting in Boston earlier this week, regents indicated that the merger was likely but said the matter of trusteeship has not been settled.

Starting March 1, all state universities and colleges will have new boards of trustees, appointed by the Governor, which will work under the regents.

Faculty union ok's pact

By DEBORAH ASBRAND
Collegian Staff

Members of the University's faculty and librarian union yesterday overwhelmingly ratified their recently agreed upon three-year pact, with over 90 percent of those who voted approving the new contract.

With 498 members of the Massachusetts Society of Professors voting on the Amherst campus, and 116 members of the MSP's counterpart on the Boston campus, the Faculty Staff Union, a total of 575 union members voted to approve the new pact.

The new contract must also be ratified by the UMass Board of Trustees, which met for the last time on Feb. 4. While no decision about the contract was announced at the meeting, Joseph Frank, faculty representative on the board, said at yesterday's Faculty Senate meeting the trustees had voted to ratify the new contract during a closed executive session.

The final ratification measures by both faculty and administration marks the end of the negotiating process that began over nine months ago, when the MSP's original contract expired on June 30, 1980.

Throughout the months of negotiations, key issues such as layoff language, librarian wages, and salaries continued to prevent a settlement. Faculty members viewed layoff language as one of the most important provisions in the new contract, as the previous pact contained no stipulations in the area of faculty cutbacks.

Union members began taking specific job actions to protest the slow pace of negotiations in early November, when an estimated 250 union members on the Amherst campus picketed the Whitmore Administration building. Several days later union officials outlined three measures of action they planed to take if talks continued to stagnate, including a one-day educational conference where contract issues would be discussed and the laying out of plans to begin the direct grading process.

As talks entered their sixth month, the Ad Hoc Faculty/Librarian Action Committee announced on Dec. 1 the union's decision to begin the direct grading process, where faculty members would withold students' grades from the administration but make them available to the students. In an MSP poll, union members had expressed direct grading as their preference over other job actions, such as staging a "sick-out" or strike.

UMBA to discuss fees, renovations

The University of Massachusetts Building Authority is scheduled to meet in Boston next Thursday when it may ratify controversial dormitory fee hikes and renovations to the Student Union lobby.

Both the fee increases and the construction of a $47,000 convienence store are the subject of a suit filed in Hampshire Superior Court against the school's Board of Trustees by 40 UMass students.

The suit charges the trustees illegally approved the dormitory rent increases and the renovation work in violation of a legal agreement between the Board and the Building Authority.

The agreement states the Trustees must obtain the BOG to educate students on store

By GREG VOLPE
Collegian Staff

To prepare for possbile upcoming controversy among University of Massachusetts students over the newly renovated Student Union candy counter, the UMass Board of Governors voted last night to approve the allocation of window display space on the new ministore to more fully "educate" students on the renovation.

Brian DeLancey, head of the Economic Development Council and board member, said he proposed the use of display space on the ministore because he felt university students lacked initial input into the renovations and now it was time for them to be informed about them.

"The window displays will educate folks, through the BOG, about the candy counter changes, and many other things which are happening on this campus. It's an area where we can show our support for students," DeLancey said.

As a result of the controversy which has surrounded the renovations since they began in December, Curtis Wohlers, serving at his last board meeting as chairperson, said the BOG, in addition to the window displays, will have a table set up in the Student Union next week to distribute pamphlets and answer questions for students concerning the renovations.

The ministore, which cost $47,000 to construct, is expected to open February 17.

In another action, concerning Campus Center renovations, Greg Dennis, chairman of the Food Service Committee, said a separate committee will meet for the first time next week, to begin plans on a possible student contest to rename the Blue Wall.

World and national news

Haig believes Soviets will invade Poland

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — As labor unrest intensifies in Poland, Secretary of State Alexander Haig Jr., is making it known — guardedly and unofficially — that he considers Soviet military intervention to be inevitable.

For the record, Haig's position is that Soviet intervention is neither imminent nor inevitable. Privately, however, Haig believes a kind of creeping anarchy is taking over in Poland, creating an intolerable situation for Moscow.

The analysis that supports Haig's view is this: Faced with a clear threat of losing control over a key East European satellite, Soviet leaders will decide they have no choice but to intervene, despite the disruptive consequences for Soviet relations with the United States and the rest of the world.

This view is winning increasing acceptance at the State Department. What is surprising is that Haig has allowed it to float to the surface, and thus to the press and the public.

News Analysis

Some officials fear that the reports could remove one restraint to intervention — eliminating Soviet fears that the United States will be surprised by the movement into Poland by Soviet troops.

In an editorial Wednesday, the Washington Post referred to "American officials who are expressing semi-publicly their expectation that the Soviets will invade," and said, "But do the officials muttering it understand the implications of what they are doing? ... They are handing Moscow an excuse to invade."

The Post did not name Haig as a source of these "semi-public" statements, but last weekend, NBC News carried one of the first reports, saying — without direct attribution — that Haig was known to believe that Soviet intervention was inevitable. Shortly thereafter, a mid-level official at the State Department said about Haig that it is "known to be his view" that the Soviets will intervene.

Haig's spokesman, William Dyess, says he has discussed these accounts with Haig and, "I deny those now."

New Polish premier asks for '90 days of peace'

Associated Press Writer

WARSAW, Poland — Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski, Poland's new premier, appealed to workers yesterday for "90 peaceful days," warning that continued labor unrest could pitch Poland into civil war. He also reshuffled the government's top echelon and announced a 10-point program to tackle the economic emergency.

Jaruzelski named six new Cabinet ministers and two new vice premiers in the sixth purge of government leaders since last summer's strikes that spawned independent unionism. He outlined an economic plan to deal with complaints on food and housing shortages but called for worker discipline and improved productivity.

The independent trade union Solidarity said in a communique it would strike only as a last resort and said it was ready to negotiate immediately. The communique was issued after a meeting of union leaders, but a spokesman, Karol Modzelewski, said it was not a response to Jaruzelski.

Busboy confesses to starting Las Vegas blaze

Associated Press Writer

LAS VEGAS, Nev. — A busboy arrested for allegedly setting the killer fire at the Las Vegas Hilton confessed he started the fire and said it happened while he was engaged in a homosexual act, a police detective said at a news conference yesterday.

Philip Bruce Cline, 23, told officers that during the homosexual act a drape was lighted accidentally by a marijuana cigarette, said Lt. John Conner, chief of the Metropolitan Police Department's homicide division.

"He indicated he had been on the eighth floor and had been with another homosexual and was engaged in a homosexual act when the draperies were set on fire next to the elevator," Conner told reporters. "He says it was lighted by a marijuana cigarette."

Conner said Cline, who initially told authorities he tried to douse the blaze Tuesday night, made the confession Wednesday, the second time he was questioned by police in connection with the fire which claimed eight lives.

"Certain statements were made by Philip Cline at 2 a.m. the morning after the fire," Conner said.

He said detectives felt "the story he was telling could not possibly be true," and they brought him in for questioning again late Wednesday afternoon.

"He was brought back in and given a polygraph (lie detector) test which he failed miserably," Conner said. "He then admitted he had set the fire at Las Vegas Hilton Hotel."

State Representative expresses optimism

Regents expected to seat student member

By ED LEVINE
Collegian Staff

In the opinion of one state representative who sits on the house education committee, the Board of Regents will probably have a student member by the end of the year.

"I sense the committee favors it. I think we will accomplish it this year," Rep. Nicholas Paleologos, D-Woburn, said yesterday during a two-day visit to the University of Massachusetts.

Paleologos said in addition to providing student representation on the board, he sees maintaining the individual personalities of the state's 28 public college and university campuses as a priority for the committee.

"I think each of the representatives (on the committee) feel that within reorganization...we've got to maintain the individualities of the campuses. With each having their own board (of trustees) it will be accomplished," he said.

Under the reorganization plan, the 15-member central Board of Regents, who will come into power March 1, will control the state higher education system with individual boards of trustees providing recommendations and having other, as yet unspecified powers. Under the old system, five boards of trustees controlled the state's public college and universities, including one board for the Amherst, Boston and Worcester campuses of UMass.

Paleologos also said he felt the reorganization of the state's higher education system, which was passed by the legislature last June as part of the state budget package, was necessary and needed to be done quickly as it was in order to accomplish it.

"I thought it was a good idea. It's a good idea to get a handle on where we're going and organize into a package the state university and college system," Paleologos said. "There were so many forces working against it, it had to happen quickly or it never would have happened at all."

Paleologos also said he feels the legislature needs to further define the role of the Regents and will probably do so this year.

"There has to be a balance of power. I basically support the notion of a smaller central board, but I don't think the board should be involved in every little thing on campus. There needs to be a balance there and the legislature will probably strike it this year," he said.

Paleologos said he feels the state's education system should be run "as any major enterprise" with managers, or the Broad of Regents, used to settle major questions.

"Decisions are made at a local level and controversies are settled on a higher level," he said.

Paleologos, 27, who was recently re-elected to a third term in the legislature, was first elected in 1976 at the age of 23. Prior to running for the legislature, he served on the Woburn School Committee for two years, while completing his bachelor's degree at Tufts University and a masters in Public Administration from Suffolk University.

WFCR struggle concludes

By STEFANIE KLEIN
Collegian Staff

After almost two months of negotiations representatives from WFCR and a group concerned with Third World programming yesterday reached an agreement on affirmative action policy and increased minority programming for the public radio station.

Following a meeting Wednesday morning between Coalition for Public Involvement in Public Radio spokesman Tony Crayton and University mediator Miriam Williford, an agreement was released detailing the University's commitment to minority programming.

Following a meeting yesterday morning, a settlement was signed.

The agreement gives a full-time position to minority producer Kari Mjiiri and an additional four hours of minority programing beginning in April.

In return for the WFCR's agreement to extend minority programming hours and the granting of full time position as producer to a minority member, the station's license will not be challenged, said Daniel Melley, director of Public Affairs at UMass.

Previously WFCR's license had come into question as a result of the cutback of minority programming such as the Spanish language show "Que Tal Amigos?"

WFCR encourages all qualified minority applications as positional become available according to the News Bureau.

Future plans for the station include minority training grants from the Corporation for public Broadcasting.

Collins presents award to UM marching band

By TIMOTHY J. FOWLER
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Marching Band honored yesterday with the presentation of a proclamation by Rep. James G. Collins, D-Amherst, for its participation in the recent presidential inauguration parade in Washington, D.C.

The proclamation from the Massachusetts House of Representatives, congratulated "the members and directors of the University of Massachusetts Marching Band for its prestigious participation in the inaugural parade," in which it represented the state on January 20, "bringing pride and distiniction to the University and to the Commonwealth."

Collins, speaking to the band members at the Old Chapel, said, "It's important to me to be able to present this proclamation to you because I was once a member of the UMass Marching Band, in my freshman year."

"We marched in the Tangerine Bowl that year, and I think you've kept up the tradition that you've always had of being the finest marching band in New England," he said.

Copies of the proclamation which was signed by House Speaker Thomas W. McGee, House Clerk Wallace C. Mills, and Rep. Collins, was given to Band Director George Parks and Drum Major Linda Paul.

"It's kind of nice to know people care, because that's what we're here for," said Parks.

While making the presentation, Collins mentioned the problem of the band being cut from television coverage of the parade and said, "The Republicans will do it every time."

ROTC trains on campus

By BRIAN SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

High above campus on the wind-swept roof of Herter Hall, Reserve Officer Training Corps' (ROTC) cadets took part in a rapelling exercise yesterday afternoon.

With nothing but a nylon rope to cling to, the cadets descended the sheer concrete wall to the ground 80 feet below.

ROTC cadet and officer in charge John Suffrin said the carefully planned and executed exercise took place yesterday afternoon to make the ROTC more noticable on campus.

"Going over the wall is great, it's a real trip. The first couple of times you're scared, but that goes away," said cadet master sergeant Andrew Tosswill.

Rapelling has several uses in actual combat, said Suffrin. It can be used in mountainous terrain to descend cliffs. In jungle areas where parachutes are impractical because of the trees, rapelling is used to drop from helicopters, said Suffrin.

Annual Directory Created

NEW YORK—The Minority Performers' Guide, Inc., a new company dedicated to the publication of an annual directory of minority performers throughout the country, has been created, it was announced by Lorrie Davis, president of the company.

In making the announcement, Ms. Davis, an actress, singer and writer, added that publication date of the new Guide had been set for July 1, 1981.

"Never before has there been a solid central source such as the Minority Performers' Guide," Ms. Davis stated. "When they need let's say a Chinese ventriloquist, casting people and directors don't really know where to go. Conversely, I'm sure there is somewhere a Chinese ventriloquist looking for work. The Guide will bring the two together, by singling out minority performers from the vast mass of talent available in the country."

A Boardway actress (she has appeared in the original casts of "Hair," "Via Galactica," and "Bubbling Brown Sugar") and author (her book, "Letting Down My Hair," was published by Arthur Fields Books), Ms. Davis stressed the fact that the Minority Performers' Guide addresses itself to all minority groups—Orientals, American Indians, Blacks, Hispanics, etc.

"I want a complete representation of all minority groups," she added. "If they are performers, they belong in the Guide.

"When it is published, the Guide will prove an invaluable tool to casting agents, directors, producers, commercial agents, writers, or anyone involved in the arts."

Specifically, Ms. Davis said she is looking for singers, dancers, acrobats, actors, night club performers, sports figures, musicians, models, specialty acts, ventriloquists, mimes, etc...who want to be "counted in" for a minimal fee. An aggressive campaign has been launched to contact them, through leaflets, posters, and ads in the trade publications.

Deadline for the Minority Performers' Guide to receive the material (pictures and resumes) is May 15, 1981. Applications can be obtained at the Minority Performers' Guide, 47 West 34th Street, New York, N.Y. 10001, tel.: (212) 279-0794.

Lecture

Professor of Law at University of Eduardo mindlane, Maputo and Mozambique, Albie Sachs will lecture on "Two Kinds of Justice: South Africa and Mozambique", Thursday, Feb. 19, 1981 Thompson 106, 4 p.m.

Sach was one of the first white people to be detained under South Africa General Law Amendment Act, (which allows for detention without trial) for defending people accused of anti-apartheid activity. In 1966 he left South Africa on an exit permit and has been since exiled. Currently he lives and works in Mozambique, collecting oral histories of its people in cooperation with a governmental effort to rewrite the history of that country. He will also speak at Hampshire College.

The Progressive Film and Speaker Series presents the film "Paul Robeson; The Tallest Tree in our Forrest" Tuesday, Feb. 17, 1981 Campus Center Auditorium 917, 8 p.m. Lecturer: Denise Miles.

CCEBS Men

MEN OF COLOR! CCEBS is sponsoring a 12-week rap group for Black, Hispanic, Asian and Native American men. Issues discussed will include ethnic identity, education, work, class differences, immigration status, institutional racism, sexuality, male-female relations, family, gender role, interracial dating, politics, cultural alienation and personal loneliness. Confidentiality will be stressed.

★ Union

Meanwhile, Faculty Staff Union members on the UMass-Boston campus staged a two-day sick-out on Dec. 2 and 3 that representatives there called "70 percent effective", with only 56 out of 236 classes being held.

At a hastily called emergency MSP session on Dec. 10, union members voted to cancel plans to implement the direct grading process after union officials had questioned the legality of the move. Union president Peter D'Errico said the witholding of grades could be viewed by the Massachusetts Labor Relations Committee as an interruption of services and could therefore be ruled illegal. If such a ruling was handed down, D'Errico said, faculty members would be subject to paycheck adjustments, fines or imprisonment.

★ BOG

Dennis said the Committee to rename the Blue Wall will work through the Collegian and other media to publicize the contest to university students.

In an unrelated motion, the Board voted by acclamation to approve Brian DeLancey as the new BOG chairman. DeLancey, a senior, will replace resigning chairman Curtis Wohlers.

Finally, Union Programs Council spokeswoman Nancy Seraphin outlined UPC's upcoming concert events. James Taylor will perform on February 19, Angela Bofill on the 20th, the Outlaws on February 22, David Bromberg on Feb. 27, the Boomtown Rats on April 1, and Ray Charles on April 22.

Authority's approval for fee hikes and any repairs or renovations over $5000. The Trustees approved both in December without Authority approval.

A hearing on the suit is scheduled for Feb. 18 when a court-appointed master will present the facts of the case to Superior Court Judge Raymond Cross.

The Feb. 19 meeting, which was postponed from yesterday, will be the first Authority meeting in more than 15 months.

Part of the suit states the issue is not the spending of money, but the apparent inaction of the Authority to repair construction defects in several campus buildings.

"Spending money to renovate a candy counter (in the Student Union) while the Campus Center roof/plaza continues to leak is like 'fiddling while Rome burns,'" stated a letter written by the students' attorney to the University. The letter was included as part of the suit.

The Authority is also scheduled to discuss recent repairs on cracking concrete walls and beams in the Campus Center Garage.

Judge recommits father, frees wife in Mass. child abouse case

WESTBORO (AP) — A judge has ordered another year of care as a mental hospital outpatient for James Nassar, accused with his wife of abandoning one starving child and throwing another's body into a garbage container.

But under the order disclosed yesterday by Westboro District Judge William F. Brewin, Nassar and his wife Patricia apparently are free to resume life together outside mental hospitals if they choose.

Nassar, 24 year old disinherited heiress to the Burns International Detective Agency fortune, was ordered freed Wednesday from Metropolitan State Hospital in Waltham. Judge Kevin R. Doyle found "no evidence that she is presently dangerous," said Joseph W. Monahan 3rd, the woman's attorney.

Judge Brewin's ruling, issued Wednesday but not disclosed until yesterday, said James Nassar, 25, would be "committed to the Westboro State Hospital or other such facility as the Department of Mental Health may determine for outpatient treatment for a period not to exceed one year."

That means Nassar must continue to receive care, but doesn't have to remain at the hospital.

It wasn't clear what the couple would do next.

Monahan said Mrs. Nassar remained at the Waltham hospital after her release order Wednesday, waiting for assistance from her family.

Officials at both hospitals refused to discuss the status of the Nassars yesterday.

"Mrs. Nassar was not recommitted. But any other information would be of a confidential nature and under law we cannot give it out," said Frank Karlon, a state Department of Mental Health official assigned to the Waltham mental hospital.

Technically, the couple could have returned home to Cambridge last July after a Hampden Superior Court judge first ruled both should be treated as out patients.

But the two told officials they did not have a place to go and voluntarily continued to live at the hospitals.

The Nassars were arrested after their 2-year-old son, Joshua, was found on the steps of a church in North Adams, Mass., on Sept. 17, 1977. The child was pronounced dead at a hospital. Doctors said he had starved. The couple told police they received orders from God to abandon the boy.

Earlier that year, 5-month-old Elizabeth Nassar died in her crib at the couple's Cambridge apartment. The Nassars said they put the baby's body in a trash bag and dumped it into a garbage container, according to police.

The Nassars were charged with manslaughter and child neglect but were found innocent by reason of insanity. Psychiatrists said the two suffered paranoid schizophrenia in a rare form of self-reinforcing double insanity.

Hope dwindles for balanced budget by 1983

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Despite President Reagan's plans for sweeping cuts in federal spending, the administration acknowledged dwindling confidence yesterday that Reagan can fulfill his promise to balance the budget by 1983.

Congressional sources said the administration appears virtually to have given up hope of eliminating red ink from the federal ledger by 1983. The sources, who asked not to be identified, said Reagan's economic aides now are indicating that 1984 probably is the earliest the budget can be balanced.

One congressional economist briefed by the administration said of a balanced 1983 budget, "I don't think that's realistic at this time."

Publicly, administration spokesmen were saying they hadn't given up on reaching their goal in 1983. But they conceded this had become exceedingly difficult.

The president "hopes, and I underline hopes, ... that we could do it as early as '83," said press secretary James S. Brady.

Reminded of Reagan's campaign statement that his economic plan "will give us a balanced budget by 1983, and possibly by 1982," Brady said: "When we talked 1982,that was before we had economy insipia, which has set in since September."

SWA fills committee seats

By JOHN DiPALAZZO
Collegian Staff

The Southwest Assembly (SWA) filled three newly-created vacancies on their Executive Committee during their first meeting of the semester last night.

Resignations were accepted from co-Vice President Mike Zona, Treasurer Steve Judge, and Communication Coordinator Terra Friedricks.

Zona and Friedricks cited increased academic workloads as the reasons for their resignations. Judge transferred from the University, and his resignation was offered in his absence.

Replacements nominated and elected were Nancy Phillips as co-Vice President, Eric Spiel as Treasurer, and Barron Roland as Communications Coordinator. All ran unopposed.

SWA co-President Kevin Mangan reported that the Assembly had more than $12,000 left in its budget after intercession expenditures.

Mangan remained on campus during the intercession to represent student in dealings with the university administration.

Police report arrests, vandalism

Daniel W. Petrie, 21, of Amherst was arrested yesterday morning on University Drive at 1:48 for driving while intoxicated, driving without a license, failure to keep to the right, and driving without a registration. University of Massachusetts police said. Petrie was arraigned at Hampshire District Court yesterday morning.

In another incident yesterday, police said the door of the off-campus housing office in Hasbrouck Laboratory was destroyed and the office ransacked between 5:20 and 6:15 p.m. There are no suspects in the case.

Also yesterday afternoon, a 10-speed bicycle worth $300 was reported stolen from the Patterson residence hall in the Southwest residential area. Police said the bicycle was stolen from the ironing room. There are no suspects in the case.

Three unrelated cases of automobile vandalism were reported to UMass police yesterday. A car parked in lot 44 had two tires slashed. The tires were valued at $120. Police said the owner of the car may know the culprit. The incident was reported at 11:23 a.m.

In the second incident two tires were reported stolen from a 1970 Ford Maverick at 1:06 p.m., police said. The car was parked in the fraternity-sorority parking lot. The tires are valued at $70. There are no suspects in the incident.

A back window was reported smashed yesterday morning at 12:20. The 1976 Pontiac station wagon was parked in lot 50 near Moore residence hall in the Southwest residential area. Police said there are no suspects in the case.

The truth is told about TMI

Three Mile Island (Random House) $11.95
By Mark Stephens

By SUSAN RING
Collegian Staff

Mark Stephens' Three Mile Island cuts through the large number of conflicting reports, and is, as its subtitle claims, the hour by hour account of what really happened.

Stephens, a journalist who served as a public information specialist for the President's commission on the accident at Three Mile Island, has recreated in lucid style the events which occurred in TMI's Unit 2 reactor and the surrounding community from March 28 to April 9, 1979 and through the following year.

Stephens' stated purpose in writing the book was to explain in an unbiased fashion what happened at TMI and why. He has made good use of the resources available to him at Stanford, where he teaches journalism, and of interviews with many of those directly affected by the accident at TMI. He is as unbiased as any clear thinking journalist can be. His description of the technical aspects of the events going on within the reactor itself is easily understood.

"Behind them, though, they left something—a small amount of water—...Less than a glassful of water was about to start the accident at Three Mile Island," (pp. 8,9). This is an example of Stephens' straight forward approach. He uses technical phrases when necessary, but explains them and supplies an accessible glossary in the back of the book.

The problems of the inaccurate information which pervaded the TMI accident is addressed throughout the book; as is the deluge of political finagling which sprung out of the situation. The struggle between the Department of Energy and the Environmental Protection Agency to establish jurisdiction is discussed. The lack of preparedness of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to deal with the situation is fully illustrated. The withholding of information by Metropolitan Edison (operator and part owner of TMI) officials is followed carefully in the book.

Review

The press as a whole has been incompetent in its coverage of TMI from the start. They aren't getting much better at it. Fuzzy stories about the latest reports on the accident are being carried by some of the newspapers. A recent issue of the Boston Globe claimed the paper had published a story on the withholding of early information concerning the severity of the accident. The story did not appear in the copy of the Globe that I read. Stephens' book is complete. There are no holes in his story.

According to Stephens, the accident at TMI resulted from the combination of poor planning, economic considerations, and human error.

Railway Society to exhibit miniatures in SUB Sunday

By AMY HASBROUCK
Collegian Staff

It will be everyone's dreams of Christmas morning come true at the Student Union Ballroom Sunday when model trains and railroad paraphernalia will be exhibited.

The Big Railroad Hobby show, which is sponsored by the Amherst Railway Society, will feature everything from small electric model to "live steamers."

Society president Bob Buck said the highlight of the free show which will run from 1 p.m. to 5 p.m. will be an operating modular N scale track, which measures eight feet by 24 feet.

Buck, who is directing this year's show, said the exhibition grew out of regular society meetings about ten years ago.

It was moved to the Student Union when the turnout continued to increase. The exhibition had been held in the Student Union for six years and Buck said he feels the show will keep growing as more people become interested in the hobby of railroading. He estimated that there would be a turnout of about 500 to 2000 people at this year's show.

Buck said the society was open to anyone, and that about ten percent of its members were students. Although most new members must pay a small membership fee, students may be put on the mailing list at no charge.

The show will also feature several films, slide shows, and a flea market. Available for sale will be railroad timetables, magazines, books, and other collectable items.

Buck said that members' interests vary from models to full sized trains including steam, electric, and diesel engines, trollies, subways, passenger cars and freight trains. There are also many members, who are interested in timetables, lanterns, cross switches, and other artifacts.

★TMI

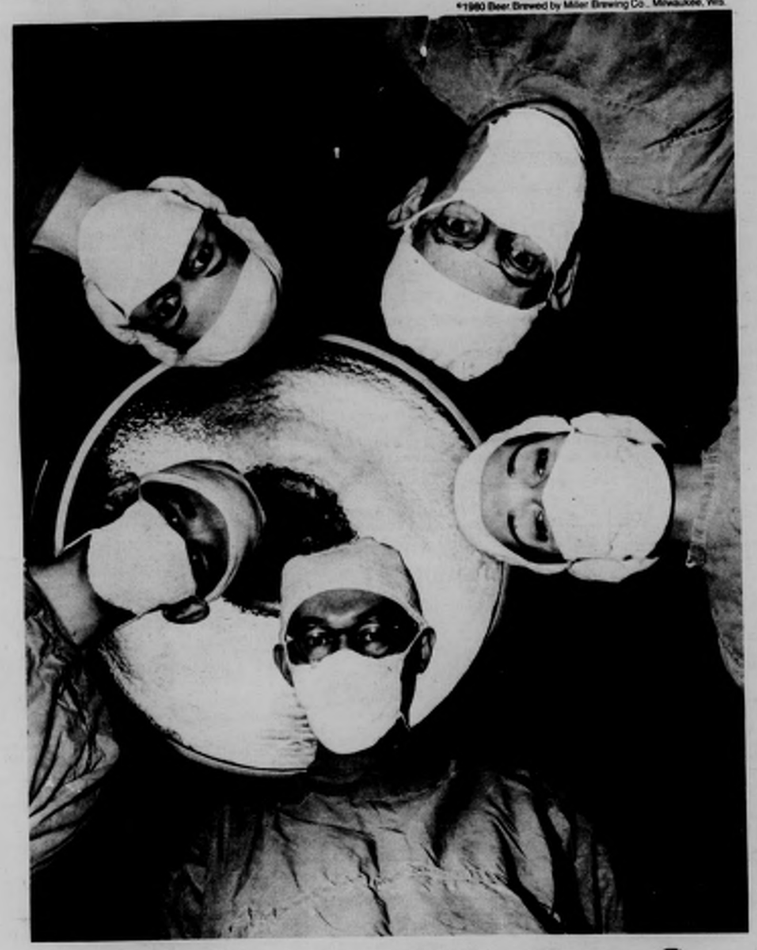
"It is certain, though, that if in that moment at thirty-seven seconds after 4 a.m. on March 28, 1979, Faust, Fredrick, Scheimann and Zewe (four plant employees) had responded to the lights and alarms by eating their packed lunches or taking a nap or doing almost anything else, there would have been far less damage to Unit 2. There might have been no accident at all."

The mass confusion surrounding the accident stemmed from the concept that what happened was impossible. No one bothered to prepare for the impossible.

In addition to clearing up questions concerning the operation and inoperation of the reactor, Stephens weaves in character sketches of those involved. Zooming in on the actions of everyone from the townspeople to the governor, the president of the U.S. to the president of Metropolitan Edison, "China Syndrome" producer Michael Douglas, Jerry Brown and the press, Stephens' book makes for fascinating reading.

Stephens' last chapter deals with the aftermath of TMI. Although the industry has begun to police itself better, economics continue to be more important than safety measures. With the advent of what seems to be a pro-nuclear administration, there is a lot to be learned about nuclear accidents and politics from Stephens' book.



Now comes Miller time.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

Out of Control

Playing cards with Cupid

Last Valentine's Day I made a zipperheaded blunder of making it known that I really wanted to get to know a particular girl. She practically headed for the hills because of my impetuous Valentine's Day delivery, which consisted of a typed note (in the shape of a heart with an arrow through it) and some glue. Glue? Well, that's a long story and a sort of harmless private joke, but since it doesn't further my point, then there's no need to elaborate. My point is this—what purpose hath thee, Day of Valentine?

If you're hopelessly in love with somebody, then Valentine's Day could be a blessing. Especially if that somebody loves you back. Valentine's Day is also for those who would like to be in like (or love) with somebody. It's the reason some of us need to take a step outside of our sheltered hearts and find a friend (something better to pat than a dog, you might say). Even the hopelessly myopic cynics among us would agree that there are more positive things to Valentine's Day than negative. For example, Valentine's Day is a great way for flower venders to show they love their families by providing food to eat for a change, instead of flowers.

Most of us take such holidays for granted. I mean, everybody knows that Valentine's Day is on February 14. But has anybody ever wondered about the originations of these dates, these holidays?

Many years ago, when I was a skinny hyperactive dwarf under the influence of Catholic nuns, I learned more than my share about originations of holidays and feasts. I was (and still am) fascinated at how many religious connections a nun could find between any two worldly points. My classmates and I were constantly being fed "pertinent" tales about various hundreds of saints upon whose feast day we unwittingly happened to wake up. We learned about St. Dymphna, the patron saint of nervous breakdowns. We learned about St. Blaise, who saved a kid from choking to death on a fish bone. Most of the stories were loaded with blood and lightning, and always there was abundant praise for those who died to protect their virginity. There was St. Francis of Assisi, who could speak to animals, and whom we were often told to emulate in our relationship with the non-human elements crawling about. St. Frank's eyes were always on us when we wished to stone a delapidated cat, or play baseball with a frog. And always remember St. Anthony, to whom we pray when we lose things. Or St. Jude, the patron saint of hopeless cases (this is true, look it up).

Well—all that has been leading to a rather unusual conclusion: I don't remember any special tales from the nuns about St. Valentine. I think he must have been an inconsequential saint, to warrant such a boring existence as a mere representative of the red rose and the paper heart. I mean, he didn't even get crucified upside-down, or shot with arrows, or have his teeth ripped out with pliers (my mother's dentist in the 1960's had hung in his waiting room a portrait of a particular toothless saint, whose teeth were plucked from her jaw as part of her initiation into the kingdom of God. This is truth). But St. Valentine? I don't recall much about him.

Maybe that is why he is so special. Valentine is constant, doesn't need martyrdom or fireworks to exist. He probably plays cards on Saturday nights with Cupid. Though I may recall the gory tales about martyrs, the tales have little influence on my lifestyle at all. The guy who was constant in his love has won the day on our calendar—so three cheers for Valentine. His day comes every year, and even every day if it makes you feel more lovable. A holiday to celebrate 'love' seems rather redundant—but maybe we have to have a reminder once in a while that reaching out, asking, touching, helping—is an effort. It is not a one-day thing, but something that must be constant and genuine. Do something nice for somebody—it'll come back to you.

Attacks on homosexuality produce fear, dismay

I was disturbed, dismayed, and to be honest, quite frightened by a recent article in the Collegian (2/11) on the Moral Majority's latest efforts to repress millions of homosexual Americans.

How often do we have to stress, how loud to we have to shout out that homosexuality is not a question of morality, but represents a type of relationship that can be just as warm, caring, and loving as any heterosexual relationship. The subject of morality is completely personal and subjective, and only the ignorant will be misled by a set of moral regulations put forth by insincere, power hungry individuals. A moral attack on homosexuals is as absurd as a moral attack on minorities in general.

The amount of money to be spent on such a ridiculous campaign stretches the imagination. It seems that these "moral" people could spend their money on hunger relief or some other humanitarian effort, since the issues of social justice are incomprehensible to them.

Aside from the money, Dean Wycoff's statement that gays should be subjected to capital punishment is reminiscent of Hitler's homosexual genocide—will we be tattooed with pink triangles soon? I can only hope that Americans will be able to see through the Moral Majority's facist facade.

Dan Pinkerton
Northampton

Depression has blackened my day. After reading the article in the 2/11/81 edition of the Collegian about an organization called Moral Majority spending $3 million on a media campaign attacking homosexuals, I guess I can expect no less an emotion. I was beginning to believe that the people of this country were finally developing a live-and-let-live attitude. However, this article reminds me of the hatred and ignorance that still exists in our society today.

Being a pre-Med student, I've kept the fact that I'm gay to a small circle of close friends. It tears me apart when I hear anti-gay remarks and jokes from family and peers. As intelligent college students, I'm asking each of you to think about the fact that gay men and women are an important part of society; as teachers, doctors, lawyers, and even parents. Homosexuality is not something one can "give up," as the article states (could you give up your heterosexuality?).

Being gay can be extremely hard for some people—trying to deal with the everyday pressures of life, as well as dealing with homosexuality, can be close to impossible. Constant reminders that negate what I am makes it even more difficult.

Please show some compassion for, and acceptance of gay people. Cool the oppressive remarks. You never know who you may be hurting. I could very well be your friend.

Praise for SGA publication

Given the time restrictions imposed by a full college curriculum, I find it both refreshing and inspiring to see concerned students find the extra hours to create a periodical like the Student Advocate. The quality of the educational format in the first edition reflected an enormous amount of research and correlation on the part of the authors.

As a member of the University community effected by tuition hikes, financial aid problems, and other community issues, I congratulate Joel Weisman, Kathy Chrusciel, Mike Perrigno, Cindy Martone, Jim Budreau, Carolyn Mckenna, and the entire Student Advocate staff, for a job well done.

Jewish group seeks funds for humanitarian services

As co-chairs of Project Renewal, the United Jewish Appeal campus campaign at UMass, we would like to take this opportunity to introduce you to the nature and function of UJA and Project Renewal.

The UJA is the largest Jewish fundraising organization in the United States. We are concerned with raising funds to meet the humanitarian—and only humanitarian—needs of Jewish people in Israel and throughout the world.

The UJA is a nonprofit, nonpolitical organization. As a charitable organization, no part of its activities involves the expenditure of funds—directly or indirectly—for military equipment or personnel or for political activity.

Funds raised by UJA and campus campaigns are transmitted to its beneficiaries: the Jewish Agency for Israel, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, United HIAS Service and the New York Association for New Americans. Less than five percent is spent on administrative costs. The funds support rescue and relief programs for Jews in lands of oppression and finance the development and maintenance of absorption, educational, social welfare, housing and job training programs for Jewish immigrants to Israel and other countries.

Project Renewal is the focus of our campus campaign. We are raising funds for rehabilitation and social services on Kiriat Moshe a neighborhood of Rehovot in Israel.

This neighborhood is scarred by physical neglect, underemployment, and cultural and social isolation. More information about Kiriat Moshe will be available at our table in the campus center on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday.

We join together proudly throughout the free world in accepting the challenge of meeting Jewish needs this year. We see our action as one which will enrich our own lives and those of Jewish people now and in the future. It is our hope that as leaders of the UJA campaign on this campus, we will be able to help other students gain a better understanding of these needs and place themselves in the Jewish lifeline by responding to them.

Despite impressive play, hoopmen fail

BY STEPHEN FREKER
Collegian Staff

It's a shame for the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team, that their games cannot be cut up into interchangeable parts as if these games were jigsaw puzzles.

If it were in anyway possible for this to come about, then the Minutemen could have taken the first half of Tuesday night's game with Rutgers and put it together with the second half of last night's contest with the Huskies of Northeastern then they would have themselves an impressive, convincing win.

Forget the detractors. Forget all the negative comments and jibes of the UMass squad this season. For 13 minutes last night, they were a solid, bonafide Division One basketball team.

Massachusetts might have lost to the Huskies, who improved their season mark, to 16-5 with last night's win, but the 65-54 final score was very deceiving. UMass showed these guys from Huntington Avenue something in this encounter. They played with emotion and heart most of the game and proved that there are still a few hoops left in this team, and they're certainly not going to quit.

"With all these young people, its hard to keep a sustained, emotional drive without some difficulty," UMass head coach Ray Wilson said. "When one thing goes wrong for us say a bad call or a big turnover, it might get them in the wrong frame of mind and they'll start expecting everything to go wrong."

The Minutemen came right at NU last night and it looked like it might be Rutgers revisited. Edwin Green found Ty Whitehead under the hoop for an layup and then Green scored one himself to put his team up 4-0 right away.

Tony DePina let it be known that he had come to play also. He hammered Husky guard Perry Moss the first time the Amherst native brought the ball down the court. Moss tried one of his spirited dunks in DePina's eye but Tony would have none of that and swatted Moss, ball and all, to a seat on the Cabot gymnasium floor.

"Tony (DePina) is one hell of a competitor," Wilson said. "He tries awful hard and plays his best ball when he channels his emotions into a controlled game."

At the sixteen minute mark of the first half, NU co-captain Pete Harris decided to get into the game. Before that he had just been taking the ball up the court and dishing off to Moss for the jumper or to center Roland Braswell for the layup.

Harris proceeded to score six straight points, dished off to Braswell twice for four more, stole the ball and threw a touchdown pass to Moss for a dunk. Wilson was forced to call the timeout with NU leading 17-8.

Harris didn't go over the 2,000 point barrier, he'll probably pass this mark Saturday against St. Francis, but he did have his typical, well balanced game, scoring 18 and playing the good "D" when he had to. Credit should go to Bill Bayno who was in Harris' shirt the second half, holding him to four points, two on free throws.

Bayno was a work horse in this one. He took a brief rest in the first half and played most of the second half and did an outstanding two way job for the Minutemen.

From 17:17, to 3:32 of the second half UMass gave the Huskies an honest run for their money. DePina started things off with two quick jumpers, he then fed Green for an easy two pointer, the score stood at 50-32 in NU favor. The Minutemen then put together perhaps their best stretch of basketball of the season with a run of straight points that stunned Northeastern and caught Husky head coach Jack Calhoun to furiously signal for the timeout.

Craig Smith was the leader of this second half attack, he hit forthree hoops in a row and then missed twice, but Ty Whitehead was there for the follow up. For once the breaks were going Massachusett's way and the bench ate it up.

"I don't know if that was our best stretch of the year," Wilson said. "I'd rather see a whole game of good basketball then just these 10 or 12 minutes anyway."

Co-captain Ron Washington had one of his better games of the season, showing some decent floor leadership and always looking for the good shot. Washington finished with 8 points and had a couple of big assists during the UMass run.

The Minutemen did lose. Their tenth straight. But the UMass community can be proud today because last night at Cabot gym these guys stuck it out, played hard, and they almost did pull it off.

Swimmers host Central Conn., on to Amherst

By ANNA ROELL
Collegian Correspondent

The UMass men's swim team will be in the Boyden pool against Central Connecticut next Tuesday at 7 p.m. It will be the last home meet for seniors Bob DeConinck, Dan Anthony and John Henriques.

UMass coach Russ Yarworth predicts an easy victory. "They're not a strong team, we'll win easily." The team's last meet of the season, however, could prove to be tougher competition.

Amherst College will be hosting the UMass men's swimmers next Thursday at 7 p.m. "It will be a tight one against Amherst College. We want a lot of fans there," Yarworth said.

The team's record was just brought up to 3-6, after a big victory against the University of New Hampshire this past Wednesday night (74-39).

UMass swim fans will get their last chance to see the UMass swimmers in action at Amherst College before the New England competition in early March.

Anyone interested in applying for the position of co-sports editor, apply to Rob Stein at the Collegian.

Gymwomen face rival Springfield

By MARY SZETELA
Collegian Correspondent

If your last few Saturday nights have been a little less than exciting, stop in and see the UMass womens' gymnastic team take on traditional rival Springfield College at Boyden Auxilary Gymnasium at 7 p.m. It promises first class entertainment.

The past could tell the story. Although UMass has won six of the nine times the teams have met, it has not been in any way, a runaway. According to UMass coach Virginia Evans, and Springfield coach Sheryl Raymond, every year it turns out to be a real spine chiller.

"I'm anticipating a close meet, but I know the girls can score higher than they have been in the past."
—UMass coach Virginia Evans

Springfield will arrive on their toes. They come off a big win, upsetting Southern Connecticut Tuesday night.

"Due to the big win over Southern Conn, the girls are really looking forward to the UMass meet," Raymond said.

Springfield boasts a well rounded team. The likes of all-arounders Laurie Peery, Alison Szuvelick, Ann-Marie Harrington, and Lauren Grimes will provide tough competition for the Minutewomen.

UMass, 5-1, will also depend on a good team effort. Top performers of late, Robin Low and Heidi Milender will have their work cut out for them. But Evans is very optimistic.

"I'm anticipating a close meet, but I know the girls can score higher than they have been in previous meets," she said.

All this in mind, one should remember that the absence of UMass freshmen and top-scorers, Michelle Santagate and Kathy Matthews who are out with ankle injuries, could have some effect on the possible outcome of the meet.

The fact remains that the team that makes the least amount of mistakes will win, and not making mistakes is not an easy task, as any gymnast would tell you.

Springfield coach Raymond agrees.

"The team that hits the routines with no faults will be the winner."

For Division II Springfield, it will be an opportunity to boost their team average.

For Division I UMass, it will be an opportunity to raise their team average in order to bid for a seeding in the Easterns (seeding are chosen on teams' averages).

For both teams it will be more than just another meet, it will be a battle of pride.

Either way, Saturday nights' traditional rivalry will be a tough meet, one which will probably come right down to the wire.

Swimwomen set three records

The University os Massachusetts women's swim team will host New Hampshire tomorrow afternoon in Boyden pool at 1 p.m., in their second to last regular season meet. The swimwomen will be looking to better a 2-8 record (three meets have gone down to the last relay).

In recent competition, the swimmers have set three school records and had two women qualify for the National championships to be held March 12-14 at North Michigan University.

Against Springfield College on January 31, Rosalie Nataupsky smashed Mary Ellen Bush's 1975 50 yard butterfly time of 28.3 with a 27.55 and Jen Black bettered teammate Leslie Johnson's 200 yard backstroke time from last year of 2:22.21 with a 2:19.35, to qualify both for the Nationals.

UMass tallied its first victory since taking the season opener against the University of Vermont, when they beat the University of Rhode Island in a tri-meet that also included Yale, last Saturday.

In that meet, a 1976 school record in the 200 medley relay was reset by the quartet of Anne Whitlock, co-captain Narcee Shiffett, Nataupsky and Jen Nicolai. They broke the old 1:58.4 time with a 1:57.7.

"The team unity has strengthened over the months and the team members have reason to feel successful," coach Val Turtle said, "they've been competing against some of the best in New England."

After UNH, the Minutewomen host Mt. Holyoke on February 17.

60's Activist Abbie Hoffman to speak at the Fine Arts Center

By ED LEVINE
Collegian Staff

Abbie Hoffman, the 1960's "Yippie" leader and nationally prominent anti-Vietnam war activist, will appear at the University of Massachusetts Fine Arts Center Concert Hall tomorrow at 8 p.m.

Hoffman, 43, a Worcester native, surrendered himself last September after living "underground" for more than six years.

Arrested in 1974 for allegedly selling cocaine to an undercover FBI agent, Hoffman jumped his $10,000 bail and went into hiding. When he surfaced in September, Hoffman revealed he had been living on Wellesley Island in upstate New York, posing as a writer and playing a leadership role in a drive to save the St. Lawrence River from a planned dredging operation.

As "Barry Freed," Hoffman lived with his girlfriend, former model Johanna Lawrenson, and his 9-year-old son. He testified before congressional committees in Washington and received letters of commendation from New York Gov. Hugh Carey for his river conservation efforts. Hoffman has also revealed that he had encountered numberous old acquaintances while a fugitive, but those people never recognized him after he had undergone plastic surgery and grown a beard.

Last September, Hoffman surfaced to tell his story, face the drug charges, return to the national political scene and lecture on College campuses. Hoffman first gained national prominence in the 1960's during the height on the anti-Vietnam effort. A student leader, Hoffman became leader of the Yippies, speaking out for individual freedom and attacking the U.S. government for its policies and participation in the war.

Tickets for Hoffman's UMass appearance, sponsored by the Distinguished Visitors Program, are on sale for $1 for UMass students, faculty and staff with identification and $2 for the general public at TIX in the Student Union Building and the Fine Arts Center Box Office.

Women in Business
What does the future hold??

By JOAN McKENZIE
Collegian Staff

Women in business are being deluded by the press if they believe there are a lot more jobs available, according to a business professor at Bentley College.

Dr. Agnes Missirian, who conducted a survey of the top 100 businesswomen, including in-depth interviews with 15, said in a recent interview in Newton: "If women think that it is going to be any easier than it was in the past, they're wrong.

"They'll (women) be competing with the residual attitudes of men, and they will also be competing with their fellow colleagues. As the competition for high level jobs and salaries becomes keener, the harder it will be for women," said Missirian, who holds a Ph.D. from the University of Massachusetts.

According to national statistics, women accounted for almost 4 percent of graduates with master's degrees in business administration nationwide in 1971; and in 1980 women represented 19 percent of M.B.A. graduates.

The School of Business Administration at UMass began in 1941. There was one student in the program and he was a man. Women first enrolled in the SBA in 1959. Out of a population of 109 students, there were two or two percent. Thirty years later in 1980, women represented 153 students out of a graduating class of 506. Their participation increased by 28 percent. Women in the school of business represented 30 percent of the enrollment.

'From The Bottom Up'

Missirian, who is in her late 40s, found that although the women she interviewed well-educated, 60 percent had graduate degrees, they had worked themselves up through low-level jobs. "These women were in the most boring types of jobs: clerical, drone jobs," Missirian said.

What are the prospects for women entering the business world in 1981? What are the advantages and disadvantages that these women face compared to the women who are in the top positions now, but who started out in low positions in the 1950's?

For one thing, there are more women entering the business world in 1981, and they are better educated than the women before them.

According to data compiled from the UMass ASSociated Alumni Office, the 1980 MBA program included a high percentage of women. In addition, this role has significantly increased over the past 5 years.

In 1975, there were 192 students in the MBA program. Of these, 39 were women or 20 percent compared to 153 male students or 80 percent.

In 1980, there were 87 students in the program. Of these, 40 were women, or 46 percent, and 47 were men, or 54 percent. Although there were less students enrolled in 1980 than in 1975, these percentages indicate a substantial improvement in the representation of women in the program.

One of the most important pieces of legislation affecting women in business is affirmative action. Affirmative action first appeared in 1973 as an executive order. The order means that employers must comply with Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (E.E.O.C.) directives to develop nondescriminatory practices. Under affirmative action, it is illegal to deny a person a job, based on his race, sex, or color.

'Support Systems'

Specific affirmative action programs examined by the E.E.O.C. are especially designed to correct the under-utilization of females and minorities.

National women's groups have expressed fears that the security of affirmative action may be threatened by the right wing movement in the country under President Ronald Reagan's administration

Reagan: Make 'the people a partner'

By JAMES GERSTENZANG
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON — President Reagan, in his televised speech to Congress tomorrow night, will seek to make "the people a partner" in combating the nation's economic woes, his spokesman said yesterday.

As Reagan and his wife, Nancy, returned from a holiday weekend at Camp David, Md., White House press secretary James S. Brady said the speech will seek to enlist public cooperation in a drastic program of tax and spending cuts.

"There's a lot of 'making the people a partner' in the plan," Brady said. "It's not simply the Reagan plan. It's going to be 'our plan'."

The speech, said Brady, will be "a clarion call saying it's not going to be 'business as usual'." A first draft of the address was circulated in the White House yesterday morning.

After his speech, the president will back away and let his economic experts and Cabinet members take over the task of explaining the program's details, Brady said.

Reagan's aides worked yesterday to assemble five documents which, along with the speech to a joint session of the House and Senate at 9 p.m. EST Wednesday, will make up the economic package.

The five documents are an approximately 30 page written message, a 12 to 15 page "fact sheet," the actual budget proposals, a two part tax document detailing Reagan's proposals for a capital recovery program for business and income tax cuts for individuals, and several pages of regulatory revision proposals.

The spokesman outlined a campaign to keep the limelight on Reagan's proposals. Congressional leaders will be brought into the Oval Office for a private briefing by Reagan before the speech.

Explosion precedes pope's homily

By Samuel Koo
Associated Press Writer

KARACHI, Pakistan — An explosive device went off at Karachi's national stadium packed with 100,000 people today, minutes before Pope John Paul II arrived to celebrate a Mass. Police said it was a bomb and killed the man who carried it and seriously injured his two accomplices.

There was no indication the pope was told of the explosion, which occurred in a stairwell while a choir sang. He delivered a 90 minute homily on Christian and Moslem respect and understanding, circled the cricket field in a jeep to wave at the cheering crowd, accepted gifts and left for Manila — the next stop on his Far East tour.

Police tentatively identified one of the victims as a Pakistani Christian but it was unclear whether the pontiff was their intended target.

A West European diplomat, who asked not to be identified, said the explosion was "small" but "deafening." It occurred in a stairwell that led to seating for diplomats.

The diplomat said he earlier saw two of the men, including the one who died, trying to slip by guards to the dignitaries' reviewing stand.

"I saw these two young chaps previously trying to get in," he said. "One of them had a bag under his shoulder."

Police said Bonilla, who was subsequently taken to Bellevue Hospital for observation, was depressed over the way the hostages were welcomed home from Iran.

Terrorists retaliate against French synagogue bombings

PARIS — Terrorists smashed two rockets into the South Yemen Embassy early yesterday in what they claim is retaliation for a deadly synagogue bombing. The thunderous explosions awakened the fashionable neighborhood and heavily damaged the embassy but caused no injuries.

"We claim the action against the South Yemen Embassy in the name of all victims of Rue Copernic," said the French-language recording played over the telephone to the Agence France-Presse news agency. "We have left a sign of our attack next to where the rockets were launched. Remember Copernic."

Legislators go before service committee to seek pay raises

BOSTON — Undaunted by the electorate's shattering rejection of their last pay raise, Massachusetts legislators will launch recovery bids tomorrow before the Public Service Committee.

The issue is particularly sensitive this year as a result of the November ballot. Not only did the voters repeal the 1979 Halloween night raise for legislators and others — by a resounding 8-1 margin — they also enacted tax-cutting Proposition 2½, which was rejected by the Legislature.

A Massachusetts legislator's base pay now is about $20,000 with $2,400 in general expenses and a per diem travel allowance.

People's Gay Alliance helps with life's pitfalls

By MALCOLM CAMPBELL
Collegian Correspondent

Editors note: In response to the series on Recognized Student Organizations printed in the Collegian last semester, the series will continue periodically this semester.

The People's Gay Alliance is a group at the University of Massachusetts, designed to help students and non-students of the gay community find social activities and cope with life's pitfalls.

The PGA, established over six years ago, evolved out of the Student Homophile League which registered as an RSO group at UMass in 1972.

"The main purpose of the alliance is to provide a sense of community, a sense of belonging," said Terry, a PGA member who declined to give us his last name. "We don't actively seek members, only an awareness of our facilities and what we have to offer. We advertise events. That is about all."

Working with a $4,000 budget granted from the undergraduate and graduate senates, as well as earning about $1,000 on their own, the PGA is able to sponsor discos, coffeehouses, movies, a gay counselling and referral service, and is also involved in addressing the issue of gay oppression.

"We speak in classes and resident assistant meetings to educate people to the fact of oppression in an attempt to alleviate situations of conflict," said Kevin George, current president of the PGA. "The basic question is one of perception, whether I am thought of as a gay person or a person who is gay. The distinction is important," he said.

RSO
RECOGNIZED STUDENT ORGANIZATIONS

The PGA is also active in gay rights lobbying efforts, usually on its own initiative but occasionally in conjunction with other groups such as the Massachusetts Gay Political Caucus or the National Gay Taskforce, he said.

"We write letters, lobby legislators directly and participate in demonstrations like the National March on Washington," George said. Nevertheless, the PGA is essentially a local phenomenon with no strong affiliations with regional or National organizations, he said.

UMass is more receptive to gays than the "real world" because here there is some recourse for action such as using the residence judiciaries to respond to cases of intimidation and violence, George said.

"Most floors are cool, but naturally there are problems. Much of the trouble comes from personality conflicts. Some people can't deal with their fears and nervousness so they lash out (against gay people), with violence and oppression," he said.

The PGA serves as a link between UMass, Hampshire and Amherst Colleges. "We work a lot together, communicating and setting up coordinated events. Their organizations are small while we are fairly large, so the PGA has a substantial role to play locally," George said. PGA membership has always been open to gay women as well as men, George said.

In the past there had been some conflict between men and women, and up to about two years ago the PGA was a male dominated organization, George said. In 1975, the Gay Woman's Caucus of the PGA split from the alliance to form the Lesbian Union—the result of "personality conflicts and political infighting," George said.

Since then, "the dust has settled" and some balance has been achieved, he said. Today several women hold administrative positions such as office manager and coordinator of the counselling collective, George said.

'Energy in Agriculture' theme of Stockbridge convention

The Stockbridge School of Agriculture has scheduled its fourth annual Professional Development Day tomorrow in the Campus Center.

The show, which has as its theme "Energy in Agriculture," will begin at 9 a.m., with James B. Kring, Dean of the College of Food and Natural Resources, making opening remarks.

Following the opening ceremony, there will be an industrial show with 5 agriculture and horticultural commercial exhibits until 5 p.m. Also, eight speakers will address aspects of each of the school's departments throughout the day.

Topics to be discussed include Horticultural Therapy, Nursery and Garden Center Merchandising, Job Opportunities in Aboriculture and the Problems of Energy in Agriculture.

"I'm very excited about the seminar speakers this year. They are some of the best in their fields," said Brian Slater, seminar chairman in a press release.

The event is funded, organized and run by Stockbridge students interested in providing a convention for students, faculty and professionals in agricultural and horticultural fields.

Edward Bemis, chairman of the event, said that the show stresses the importance of maintaining a knowledge of new methods and concepts related to the agricultural industry. He said the show promises to provide students and professionals with a chance to meet and discuss business trends, new practices and problems of agriculture and its employment opportunities.

An audience of over 1000 people including 90 percent of the Stockbridge student body, attended last year's show, Bemis said.

"The program is designed to be of interest to all University and Stockbridge students, as well as professionals in the field," he said. Admission is free.

Physical education dept. offers T'ai Chi Chuan

By CARLA R. LESH
Collegian Staff

One of the lesser-known martial arts is now being taught in the University of Massachusetts physical education department.

T'ai Chi Chuan, a health exercise as well as a martial art, consists of a program of 37 postures performed in slow motion. The entire routine takes about 10 minutes to complete, said Eric Johnson, a club member.

"T'ai Chi helps to relax, increases vitality, improves your posture and revitalizes the body in general," Johnson said.

T'ai Chi concentrates on lower body strength; it emphasizes the leg muscles rather than the traditional Western concentration on the upper body and arms.

"Through T'ai Chi, the center of gravity moves to a lower point in the body, and a participant is able to balance better and move more easily," Johnson said.

T'ai Chi was introduced to the United States by Professor M.C. Cheng in 1963. Cheng had shortened the program or form, from 108 postures to 37 postures, Johnson said.

The martial art of T'ai Chi is sometimes hard to realize, Johnson said because the exercises are not aggressive. By applying T'ai Chi when faced with a dangerous situation, a participant deflectys the attack of the other person without expending an excess amount of energy.

The goal of the School of T'ai Chi is to make it available to anyone who wants to learn it. Johnson said T'ai Chi was passed on from master to student in China and was not available to the general public.

Dinner features Jewish poet

Hillel will participate in an educational dinner tomorrow in Hampden Student Center on Project Renewal, a program designed to aid thousands of people who immigrate to Israel each year.

The dinner, which will be held in the Kosher dining Commons at 8:30 p.m., will feature guest speaker Danny Siegal, who will speak on "Tzedakah and Poetry; slide shows; a discussion; and printed material on Project Renewal.

While many immigrants to Israel have been helped through the Jewish agency, another non-profit aid organization, about 10 percent of the country's population has not been as fortunate.

The project was begun by the United Jewish Appeal to help about 300,000 Israeli immigrants living in sub-standard conditions. Each donation from the UJA is matched by the Israeli government.

Some project programs include building new apartments; renovating and enlarging old buildings for use by large families, and constructing schools, nurseries and old age homes.

The UMass chapter of the United Jewish Appeal's Project Renewal is supporting the Kiriat Moshe neighborhood in Rehovot, Israel.

Bonnie Raitt dazzles during MUSE benefit concert at Smith

By RON MILLER
Collegian Staff

A Valentine's Day love affair was sparked between Bonnie Raitt and the packed house at the Musicians United for Safe Energy (MUSE) benefit concert last Friday night at Smith College.

Raitt put on an astoundingly powerful performance and had a wonderful rapport with the audience. She had the crowd dancing in the aisles and rushing toward the stage to get a closer look.

Raitt voiced her objection to nuclear power throughout the set. When she made her entrance with roses in hand, she was greeted with a standing ovation. "We've got to stop this bullshit (nuclear power plants) before it goes any further," Raitt said. The audience roared in agreement.

The concert opened with Dave Van Ronk replacing Tom Rush, who was ill. Van Ronk played a accoustic set. The crowd seemed a little bored at first, but eventually grew interested, and called him back for an encore.

After a short delay the John Hall Band came on. The first part of their set was weak, consisting mostly of sappy pop tunes, but later they really jazzed up their act. The band, which is comprised of drummer Eric Parker,

'Cosmic Funk Quartet' mixes music

By F.C. WYSE
Collegian Correspondent

"Yes, the audience was very receptive and, all in all, it was really nice playing here, and I'm looking forward to a return gig soon," said Chris Dixon, one of the two guitarists in The Cosmic Funk Quartet.

"It's easy to get a first gig, but return gigs are hard to find with this kind of music, you see," he said.

The idea of fusion, performed by the quartet, is the give and take of jazz, funk and rock within new cultural and musical frameworks–if the two can ever be separated. The end product is a totally new music, one that synthesizes these three forms into a melting pot notion of music, rather than maintaining each withing a cultural stronghold.

One can easily recognize, isolate and label parts of this music as distinctly "rock," "funk-influenced," or "bearing jazz harmonies." Perhaps this very quality accounts for its mixed reception.

But it is where music is going and the quartet certainly has a hand in the shape of things to come. The lead singer/guitarist, Pat Jones, has a sincere stage presence and band members appear to genuinely enjoy what they are doing.

And they should because they do it well. The compositions, mostly originals by either Jones or the keyboard player (whose twin brother plays drums) are thoughtful tunes and well organized throughout.

The group plays well together and their arrangements are worked out nicely, and are obviously well-rehearsed so that the stage is shared equally. It was a fine show and let's hope to hear again soon from The Cosmic Funk Quartet.

★ Women in business

In addition to educational systems, women entering the business world in 1981, are provided with support systems that women entering business fields in the 1950's didn't have.

The Association of Graduate Business Women (AGBW) a national organization with a UMass chapter, provides a psychological support system for women entering the business world.

According to Rita Farrell, president of the UMass chapter, the AGBW originated two years ago at a national conference at the University of Pennsylvania.

"Women from across the country attended the conference. They felt there were a growing number of issues affecting women that needed to be addressed. The AGBW was the beginning of a national network to address those issues," Farrell said.

Debbie Orshavich, a member of AGBW, said the association sets up a series of workshops to acquaint women with what lies ahead in business fields. The workshops address such issues as dual-earning family care with a career, stress, and [illegible]. Social issues discussed include how men and women relate to each other on the job.

According to Orshavich, the workshops are also designed to expose injustices on the job, such as illegal [illegible] (discriminating against married women, for example), and sexual harrassments.

In the BBA program at UMass, five of the 36 graduates are women. Although the number is not large, Cass teaches cost accounting does not [illegible] it is an indication of the school's unwillingness to recruit women. "The reason that there are not more women in the business school is because everyone is trying to hire women and UMass's pay scale is not that good. Massachusetts colleges are not paying as well as other states," Cass said.

"Women Were Motivated"

One-third of the students in Cass' classes are women. Cass said she has found that women who go into business are more motivated than men. "They [illegible] are going into traditionally male fields and as a result, are more motivated. Their performance is right across the board," Cass said.

Janice Hill, a finance professor, said one of the major disadvantages women have is their lack of a necessary technical background. According to Hill, women must obtain these skills if they are going to enter positions designed for within a company upward mobility. Hill who worked for the Federal Reserve Board in Washington, D.C., said she said a lot of women avoid finance because it deals with numbers, a traditionally male field.

"Women have been thought not to be too proficient in numbers, and as a result, in high school they are discouraged from math and sciences and do not pursue these studies," she said.

Eva Mitchell, who holds an MBA from UMass, is a Senior Management Counselor at the Center for Economic Development at the SBA. Mitchell, who offers financial analysis of past performance and future projections for small businesses, said she had to overcome her fear of numbers.

★ Women in business

"When I was in high school I felt I could not compete with all the men who were pursuing math related fields. Women have to overcome these fears, she said.

The major problem women face who are entering the business world is combating the prejudices that existed in the 1950's and still exist today. According to Professor Hill these prejudices are deeply rooted and change will be a slower process in firms where such attitudes exist.

"Many men think that women will leave to take care of a family. They think that it will be the number one priority in all cases," Hill said.

'Proving One's Self'

In addition, Hill said, women are constantly in a position where they must prove themselves. Men judge a new woman employee based on their impression of previous women workers. "There is a lot of pressure on that woman to set a good example. That pressure doesn't exist for men," Hill said.

Successful infiltration by women into executive positions is not easy to project, according to Dr. Missirian. "Power is not given up gratuitously," Missirian said. She pointed out that it is not only in the attitudes of older men where the prejudices lie, but in the minds of younger men as wel.

"Younger women seem to think the danger is from older men. It is my judgment that the real danger is from younger men who are their peers, who can talk a good game about equality, but who emotionally are unable to deal with it," Missirian said.

In her research, which included interviews with representatives from IBM, General Motors and Lockheed, Missirian discovered that the women presidents and vice presidents worked in subsidiaries and therefore did not hold Fortune 500 status.

In her research, Missirian eliminated women who inherited their positions from their families or husbands or who were in business with their husbands or sons. Missirian found that unlike men who work their way up in business, through supervisary positions, the top women had achieve their titles by working their way up through staff positions.

'Not In Mainstream'

A staff position is one that is adjacent to the business the company is involved in. It does not include supervisory power, or in other words it is not in the mainstream, according to Missirian.

According to Missirian, a woman must establish her own self-image and actively seek opportunities for growth in the business world. "She has to learn to maintain and support her own perception of herself as an aggressive, intelligent person, because the corporation will not do that for her," Missirian said.

Health services offers 3 hour workshop on coping with stress

University Health Services is offering a three hour workshop, "Understanding and Coping with Stress," for students and their dependents. The goal of this workshop is to help people recognize and manage the stress they face in their everyday life. Several techniques for dealing with stress will be explored.

The workshop will be co-facilitated by Dyann Matson of the Health Education staff, and by Lynn Kirk of Mental Health. It is scheduled for 6:30 to 9 p.m. Thursday. Preregistration is required. Contact the Health Education Office at 549-2671.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

Talking to Ralph

Credited where it isn't due

Kevin Cullen

The letter came in the mail the other day. It was postmarked St. David's, a godforsaken town buried somewhere in the bowels of Pennsylvania. The kid had no idea where St. David's is, and even less an idea of what was in the envelope.

And, so, the letter was opened.

"Enclosed is your new Sears Credit Card" the letter announced.

The kid frowned. He did not apply for a Sears credit card. He did not want a Sears credit card. But, at 21 years of age, he sat in his Brittany Manor apartment, with a paper due, no milk for his Honey Nut Cheerios and his new Sears credit card.

A small piece of white plastic, lined with a dull golden trim and black letters and numbers proclaimed the kid's new identity. At over 3600 Sears locations coast to coast, in Alaska and Hawaii, the kid was now number 3807881566566. His very existence had been reduced to a 12-digit series of numbers.

And, to add insult to unwanted burdens the kid was only given a $160 line of credit. The kid knew he was a poor son-of-a-bitch, but now everybody at Sears Roebuck and Co. knew he was a poor son-of-a-bitch, too.

What scared the kid most was the actual thought of being able to buy things without paying form them. This smacked of illegitimacy and threatened to make a poor son-of-a-bitch even poorer.

Aside from the psychological factors, for purely practical reasons the kid saw no need for the credit card. What was he going to buy at Sears? Craftsman tools? Johnnie Miller suits? Winnie the Pooh coordinates?

And, so, the kid made a call.

"Hello, I just received a Sears credit card which I never applied for," the kid said.

"Really?" the woman on the other end asked.

"Yeah, really."

There was a pause and then the woman gave the kid another number to call, saying if he called that number he would receive an explanation as to why he received a Sears credit card for which he never applied.

And, so, the kid made a few more calls.

The answers, or non-answers, were pretty much the same, and so the kid decided to call Chicago because if you want answers, or non-answers that make any sense, you have to go to the top.

"Hello, I just received a Sears credit card in the mail and, to tell you the truth I never even applied for it."

"Hmmm," the woman in Chicago said. "Well, someone must have sent the application in for your."

That made sense, though the kid hadn't a clue as to who would do such a thing.

"But I don't want it," the kid said.

"Why not?" the woman in Chicago asked.

The kid thought, briefly, about giving the woman in Chicago a big long sigpiel on how the though of buying things on credit scared the hell out of him and how guilty he felt and how insulted he was at being given only a $160 line of credit, but this, he reasoned, would take too-long, so he was direct and to the point.

"Lady, I'm just a poor student, I really don't need a credit card."

"Perhaps not now," the woman in Chicago began. "But you never know about the future. You've established a line of credit with the largest chain of department stores in the world, and this makes your future applications for credit that much easier, right?"

The kid could not answer.

"And, besides," the woman from Chicago added, as if she knew it would kill him. "In a few years, you'll probably have a family and a need for credit with us."

That did it. The kid could see it all. Two kids, one drooling and in diapers, the other running around like a little fiend in the grocery on acid trip. "Daddy, buy this! Daddy, buy this!"

The kid could see it all. His wife, the hostess gown from the super sellers-form-astronomical-size, her hair shot-card-thick, her figure expanded more than slightly.

The kid saw it all. His himself, a chain-smoker with shaking hands, bloodshot eyes, two kids, a wife and a [illegible] in Chicago.

And a Sears credit card.

The kid hung up the phone and went into his room, contemplating life as a 21-year-old poor son-of-a-bitch in a world where everybody was crazy, except him.

No visible means of support

It's with great interest that I read about ROTC's recent maneuvers here at the University designed to increase their visibility on campus (Collegian, February 13). I believe a similar argument in support of "visibility" is being made by Secretary of State Alexander Haig in defense of U.S. aid to the ruling junta in El Salvador and by Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger in support of the neutron bomb.

Concert plans conflict in purpose

It seems as though certain administrators are attempting to set the parameters within which our spring concert is expected to exist. These restrictions would make it impossible to put on a show of any quality for our students. However, the administration now says that they are not opposed to a good show, so long as the students pay for it. We think that we pay for enough already.

We have always tried to offer diverse shows that appeal to as many members of the community as possible. We feel that to charge students would inhibit many students from experimenting with hearing different types of music. Further, charging money makes this a socioeconomic class affair since lower income persons will be hardpressed to attend the event. We feel that this would be a tremendous step backward.

We have heard from many students and almost everyone agrees that UPC's present plan is a good one, a plan which is well thought out. We think it is time that students let the administration know how they feel about this issue.

Write letters to the editor, come up and give us your name if you are interested in saving our Spring Concert, but get active. There is tremendous student unity on this issue, let's pull together and put on the 13th Annual Spring Concert. We don't want to pay $10.00 a ticket, how about you?

Rich Moran
Rich LaVoice
SGA Co-Presidents

Unrealistic possibilities

Despite the SGA's and UPC's efforts to provide a high quality spring concert, the administration is showing an unwillingness to negotiate a realistic spring concert policy. Vice-Chancellor Madson's position makes it virtually impossible for UPC to give students a quality spring concert. As with any show there are a number of fixed costs, yet Dr. Madsen's guidelines allow few if any ways to raise revenue. This means that for a good show to be put on, the students will have to pay for tickets on top of our regular fees.

In good faith UPC has developed a sound proposal, for a community day, which includes everything from alcohol control to a professional security staff. Still, certain administrators continue to work to make spring concert unrealistic possibility. Students should not put up with this. Make your voice heard. Write to the Collegian and call 545-0487.

Survivors of Dublin fire talk about their escapes

By NEIL O'CONNOR
Associated Press Writer

DUBLIN, Ireland — Through flames, thick black smoke, and panicked crowds they survived the tragic Dublin nightclub fire that took 48 lives. Survivors talked yesterday from their hospital beds about their escapes.

Pauline Reid, her badly burned face and hands in bandages, smiled despite the pain as she lay in a bed at Dublin's James Hospital.

"I'm alive and it's great," she said.

The 22 year-old Dubliner described what happened in the early hours of Saturday morning toward the end of a "Dance the Night Away" Valentine's Eve disco dancing competition at the Stardust Cabaret nightclub, attended by 800 young people. The fire, the worst in this Irish capital's history, injured 130 people. Nine were reported in critical condition on yesterday.

"There were six of us together, dancing away. Then we saw the fire ... within minutes the flames seemed to be everywhere.

"I ran to a back door, but there was a crowd gathered at it and somebody said it was locked. I couldn't breathe in the smoke and I couldn't get out ...

"I gave up, I just gave up and lay on the ground to die ... then suddenly I heard a great crash and I saw headlights shining at me through the darkness."

"Somebody had driven a car from outside through the door to smash it down. I just leaped up and ran to the lights and then I was outside. Whoever drove that car into the door deserves a medal because all around me people were choking on the floor.

"We all ran to the lights and lived," she said.

Marian Mahony said she heard a disc jockey appeal to "keep calm" — and then all hell broke loose.

"Within seconds the place was full of thick, black smoke. I couldn't see where the door was but I just kept moving. I grabbed onto a fellow's hair and we pushed through together. I don't even know who he was."

At the city morgue, police continued the grim task of trying to identify 24 victims whose bodies were too badly charred for recognition.

★Bonnie Raitt

keyboardist Bob Lienbach, bass player John Troy, and Hall on lead guitar and lead vocals were good. But the concert crowd definitely belonged to Raitt.

Hall and company acted as Raitt's back-up band (they teamed up to save money), and really started to cook when she came on. Hall played a surprisingly strong lead guitar, but I loved it when Bonnie took over the leads.

Her voice in perfect form, she played a varied set that included old favorites "Run Away" and "I Thank You," Robert Palmer's "You're Gonna Get What's Coming," which she dedicated to her boy friend, and even "Happy Birthday" to drummer Eric Parker.

The audience wouldn't let Raitt and the boys go home. They came back three times and played a total of four encores. Included in this was "Power" take all your atomic poison power away, the anthem of the anti-nuke movement. The crowd sang along. When Bonnie came back for the first of the encores she exclaimed, "There's enough energy here tonight to run the whole state of Massachusetts."

She summed up the evening when after her second encore she said, "I love you guys; you're blowing me away." The fact was, though, that she blew Smith College away, and Bonnie was everyone's valentine Friday night.

Engineering, Computer Science, Math and Physics Majors...

Take Your Degree Into A Real World Laboratory - With Vitro!

Not only are we working on complex Naval Weapons Systems that will revolutionize current state-of-the-art standards, we're offering opportunities for growth and professional recognition that put us way ahead of our competition. At Vitro, almost every project we take on represents a significant part of a major national issue. Depending on your interests, you could be involved in the systems engineering, integration, and analysis of the fleet shipboard combat system development, or the application of advanced computer technology in support of complex systems engineering programs. It's a career that has implications well beyond the academic.

As one of the nation's leading systems engineering firms, we can offer the new graduate a career package that includes tuition reimbursement, group insurance, paid vacations, retirement programs, a very good salary, and the opportunity to become involved immediately in significant long-term programs. You'll also enjoy being located "at the pulse," in suburban Maryland, near Washington, D.C., within easy reach of the many cultural advantages of the Nation's Capital.

Vitro positions require problem-solvers who have technical ability and engineering creativity. If you're about ready for a real world application of your classroom problem-solving skills, let's talk about tomorrow: yours and ours. We'll be on campus February 25; or contact Maureen Conrad, College Relations Coordinator, Toll Free at (800) 638-2901, ext. 4050. Check with your Placement Office for details.

Trackmen win one in tri-meet

By JANE WOLFSON
Collegian Staff

Sparked by the consistently winning performances of Pat Beaulieu, John Wright and Bill DeVarney, the University of Massachusetts men's track team finished second in a tri-meet Saturday afternoon defeating Holy Cross while losing to host Boston College. The final scores were BC 92, UMass 57, and Holy Cross 19.

'Basically we have about 10 guys that are consistently chipping in with regularity.'

Wright won the hurdles for UMass with a final time of 7.6. DeVarney captured the 60 yd. dash with times of 6.3 in the trials and 6.4 in the final. Beaulieu found yet another event to win capturing the 3000 m run with a time of 8:23.2, that time qualifying him to run that event in the New Englands.

UMass took a somewhat surprising one-two finish in the shot put as Stephen Hyder continued his winning ways for UMass taking first with a throw of 50'4½" and Tom Pirro placed second with his best throw of 46'1½". Hyder also took third in the 35 pound weight throw at 53'8½".

UMass' Mark Grasso placed second and third in the triple and long jumps, with jumps of 45'3½" and 20'11" respectively.

Freshman Brian Osborne won the 500 m with a time of 1:07.7.

Rick Cady and Dale Whiting finished first and third in the 400 m with times of 50.1 and 51.9.

UMass also captured the 1600 m relay at 3:25.

"Beaulieu, Wright, DeVarney and Osborne all had outstanding performances for us," UMass Coach Ken O'Brien said.

"Basically we have about 10 guys that are consistently chipping in with regularity," O'Brien said.

The track team will have no more regular meets for the duration of the indoor season. Their next competition will be the New Englands on Feb. 28 at Boston University.

ENGINEERS, YOUR SHIP IS COMING IN.

It might be a nuclear sub or a billion dollar aircraft carrier. At the Norfolk Naval Shipyard, you can provide engineering support for the maintenance and testing of the most sophisticated technology in the world with hands-on experience that will challenge your personal creativity, stimulate and enhance your engineering knowledge, and assure you a good measure of responsibility on important projects.

Our shipboard recruiter will be on campus on Thursday, February 26, 1981

Located in the Tidewater, Virginia area, the shipyard is surrounded by a vast array of recreational and cultural activities. Just minutes away, the resort city of Virginia Beach hosts water activities of all types and descriptions. Also, the shipyard is just a short drive from the Blue Ridge Mountains with its spectacular fall foliage and numerous winter ski resorts.

Swimmers lose, but set 2 records

By FRANK NAGLE
Collegian Correspondent

Despite loosing to a strong UNH team Saturday at Boyden Gym by the score of 76-55, the UMass womens swim team managed to set two more new school records.

The records were set in the 400 yard medely relay with a time of 4:18.54, and the 1000 yard freestyle with a time of 11:19.41 by Leslie Johnson. Johnsen's time shaved over 11 seconds off of Nancy Shiffett's old record of 11:30.1.

In 15 events held in the meet UMass won eight, but UNH won the relay races that give more team points than individual points.

In other events Jen Nicolai won the 50 yard freestyle with a time of 25.72, and Jennifer Black took the 100 and 200 yard backstroke with times of 1:05.32 and 2:20.23 respectively. Johnson won the 200 yard freestyle with a time of 2:02.23 and Rosalie Natauski won the 100 yard butterfly in 1:01.69.

The Diving Team saw Gina Perrone win both the one and three meter competitions. In the one meter competition Perrone outscored all other divers with 184.65 points. In the three meter competition Perrone outclassed the rest of the field amassing 201.30 points, 21 points more than the next diver.

Head Coach Val Turtle feels that despite the loss there are many things the two and nine team should be optimistic about. "The team is improving individually and as a unit. I feel we can do very well in our next meet."

The team's next and last meet is on Tuesday February 17, at 7 p.m. in the NOPE Gym against Mount Holyoke.

Minutewomen win; trip CCSC, 71-65

By MIKE ESTRADA
Collegian Staff

After more than a week of mediocrity, the UMass women's basketball team got the offensive thrust it needed from senior co-captains Ginger Legare and Julie Ready at Curry Hicks Cage last night, where the Minutewomen dumped Central Connecticut State College, 71-65.

Paced by a combined, 34 point effort by the senior tandem, and enhanced by the ball moving ability of junior Sherry Collins, UMass ended its four-game losing skein, at times convincingly so.

With the exception of a last minute charge by the visitors during which the Blue Demons closed to within five points, the Minutewomen controlled the contest from the middle of the second half on; constructing leads of 11 and 13 points.

Ready sparked the resurgence with an 11-point blitz off the bench in the first half and Legare helped maintain it with a 15-point effort in the second, an indication that the veterans are far from yielding to the future of UMass women's basketball.

Scrambling for a spot in the eastern regionals of the Eastern Association for Intercollegiate Athletics for Women tournament, UMass (13-11) badly needs wins against its next three opponents, Southern Connecticut and division one's Rhode Island and Boston University, to help its tourney hopes.

"We're still in contention," Ready said. "But we have to win the rest of our games against Division One teams to have a real chance."

Central Connecticut, a division 11 club, falls to 9-11.

In the early going, it looked as if UMass was going to have the same offensive problems that plagued the locals in recent losses to Montclair State and Dartmouth. After three Minutewomen turnovers, the Lancer's Fast Schooner took a lead inside and hit on a hunker to make the score 14-5 at 14:46.

The Minutewomen answered with five points on the strength of two Sue Carey buckets down low in the lane and a more patient offense that set up Legare for two of her four first half points. The strike that brought UMass completely back was a full-court pass from Tricia Corcoran to Legare that the co-captain converted into a lay up to make the score 15-19.

But the biggest thrust came when Ready checked in with 10:51 to play in the first half. After Legare brought UMass to within three, 29-17, Ready scored seven straight points including a three-point play that gave UMass a four-point edge, 24-20.

Central rewired its inside game for a more realistic attack against the superior size of Ready and the rest of the Minutewomen front three, and the shooting attack they assembled was timely and effective. The visitors shot only 36 percent from the floor in the first half (28 for 77 the entire game) but as an offensive weapon its shooting saved Central from total destruction.

After forcing two turnovers with a full-court press, the Blue Demons closed the score to 30-29 when Irene Pierce, the game's high scorer with 22 markers, snapped a 20 footer with 56 seconds left in the first half.

"We try to work the ball inside but not when we're going against players over six feet tall," Central coach Brenda Reilly said. If it's a zone defense and we're not pressured on the outside, we'll take the shots."

Bonnie Lynch gave Central a one point lead when she hit both ends of a one-and-one, but Ready capped her first half performance by swishing a 10-footer to put UMass up 32-31 at the intermission.

The lead changed hands three times in the opening minutes of the second half. Freshman Wendy Ward answered a Pierce outside with a 20-foot bomber at her own basket to give the Minutewomen the lead for good, 36-35.

UMass built its second half leads largely with what can be labeled the Sherry Collins show. Tearing a five minute stretch, the junior from Amherst scored six points, dished out three assists and stole two more in UMass jumped ahead, 54-45.

UMass' Nadine Jackson scoops the ball away from Central Connecticut's Irene Pierce (number 24-game high scorer with 22 points) in last night's basketball game at the Cage. The women snapped a four game losing streak with a 71-65 win over the Blue Demons.

moved twice more before Ward and Nadine Jackson (21) rebounded for consecutive baskets to give the Minutewomen the lead for good, 36-35.

Gymwomen tally sixth win, men lose first

Navy wins all but one event

By ELIZABETH BARONE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team suffered its first loss of the season on Saturday when Navy beat them 108.35-106.90. The gymnasts' record now stands at 5-1.

After the first event, the floor exercise, UMass held a 5.15 point edge. However, Navy then won a 5.5 duel after the pommel horse competition and although there was some close scoring in the following four events, Navy managed to hold the lead until the end of the meet.

UMass Coach Roy Johnson said the loss was due to the fact that, "All gymnast of our opponent's routines had a major break. Navy had basically the same type of routine composition, but they hit all theirs. Low scores on the pommel horse also hurt us," he added.

Although Navy won every event but the floor exercise and the long horse vaulting, UMass gymnasts still turned in numerous outstanding performances. Junior Steve Craig won the floor exercise event with a 9.05 while teammate Bob Lamb scored 9.05. The same two helped UMass win the long horse vaulting competition. Lamb was first place with a score of 9.75 and Craig garnered a 9.65 for second place.

John Mehosaglo's impressive 9.20 score on the rings was good enough for second place since Navy's Dale Bolling, current in a 9.30 score in the same event, Navy put edged UMass in the still ring competition by 0.3 of a point.

Bob Lamb again scored well on the horizontal bar, with an 8.85, but Navy still won the event by a 48.50-43.85 score. Navy overall competitors, Dale Madden and Jeff Moore took first and second on the horizontal bar with scores of 9.30 and 9.00 respectively.

All-around competitor for UMass, Bob Gardner, had his finest performance in the long horse vaulting competition where he scored 8.70. "I felt like I had a good day, but I felt like I didn't quite get it all together. The long trip home to a cold did not help anybody's performance."

The Minutemen will travel to Southern Connecticut this Wednesday for their next meet.

Robin Lear scores high on floor exercise and vault

By MARY SICCOLA
Collegian Correspondent

As predicted by UMass Coach Virginia Evans, it took a total team effort for the UMass women's gymnastic team to defeat Springfield College 141.70 to 141.15 in a strong win Saturday night at Hayden Southern Gymnasium.

It began with one of the highlights of the season, Robin Lear, who has scored consistently high throughout the season, landed a textbook vault which would have made Cathy Rigby proud.

Absolutely stark Ron Anderson was pleased not only with Lears' vault, but also with her performance in the floor exercise.

Robin had exceptional height on her vault and so hit the floor excellent, her score said it all," he said (she received an 8.5, her highest of the season).

Springfield remained close throughout the meet. Although, Ann Marie Harrington, who finished third overall, helped Beth Weinstein, injured in keep the score close. Lori Dorey, top all-arounder, was injured during warm ups and therefore could not compete for the Chiefs.

But UMass stars were several individual goals accomplished. Co-captain Galen Thurston, who hasn't competed since December 10, due to back injuries, scored well on the balance beam. Karen Clemente's season high score of 8.5 on the vault was strong and Karen Knapp put in an outstanding performance on the balance beam, also receiving her lowest score of the season on that event, an 8.5.

For all three individual efforts together and a superb a total team win, something UMass has been doing all season.

UMass appeal to second to 6-1, the only loss was to Penn State who is ranked second nationally.

The Minutewomen will travel to Southern Connecticut on Wed. at 7 p.m.

Max Robinson of ABC World News Tonight is encouraging women and people of color" to become a part of journalism. In front of a crowd of some 200 students at Smith College, Robinson explained to us why the number one national desk anchorman handed in his resignation.

Robinson states, "I am responsible for a good deal of the ratings at ABC, they have admitted publicly and they have admitted it to me."

Robinson, a black recipient of the Ohio State Award, broke the story of the network brass and along with Hal Walker another black man who was stationed in Germany found themselves excluded from two of the nations biggest stories of the year.

When Ron Reagan was crowned and our hostages came home there was an orgy of journalism the likes of which I have never seen in my young life, I'm 41." I watched it from the sidelines because ABC elected not to include me in either event, even though I am the national desk anchor", Robinson said.

When the hostages came to West Germany, Walker was suddenly reassigned to cover the Iran-Iraq War. Strangely, black people disappeared from the tube. What happened to black people, forget that blacks use Americans too? Or was it planned that way?" It was said Robinson, "So one of us was sent to Iran, one to Iraq, one to Germany and I was left to cover the White House. I'm responsible for a good deal of the ratings at ABC, they have admitted publicly and they have admitted it to me."

Atlanta Feb. 13 -The bodies of 2 black children were discovered Friday as fear and worry intensifies in the city of Atlanta. There was speculation late that afternoon, that one of the victims of these child murders acts, as one of 11 missing children.

Police searching a wooded area of Fulton County found the skeletons of three children and also the body of 14-yr old Lubie Geter who disappeared on Feb. 5.

The special police task force investigating the murders of several black children, another result of the action of strengthening the ranks of the task force with more seasoned criminal investigators. Mayor Reading, a deputy chief in charge of the criminal investigations division was appointed head of the task force, replacing Maj. W.J. Taylor. Taylor's investigators have been criticized in recent weeks as being significantly weak.

400 Years of Slavery

by Curtis Haynes Nummo Staff

§By the year 1850 over one third of the people of African heritage lived outside of Africa.

§Many of these Africans would system within which they lived. In the United States slaves would seek deliverance through organized rebellion and insurrection. Others would be non-cooperative with the system in a way that gave them a reputation for being lazy, clumsy, dishonest, etc. The "free" African-american of the North would speak out against their conditions but to little avail, as most of the Northern States had severely limited black political activity through intimidation and law. Still, individuals like David Walker would demand that slaves rise up and throw off their chains, while others like Martin Delany would suggest emmigration for those who knew that freedom could never be realized in the United States.

§When the American Civil War broke out in 1861 African-americans believed that life would get better for them, and they flocked to join the Union Army. They were to discover that they were not wanted, not until 1862 when the Northern forces feared they may loose the war. Thus, in a time in need the black man was there.

By the end of the Civil War African-americans made up ten percent of the federal army and twenty five percent of the navy.

§On February 1, 1863 President Abraham Lincoln (a president who urged the migration of blacks from America) signed the "symbolic" Emancipation Proclamation. In December of 1865 the ratification of the 13th Amendment "freed" all slaves. However, with their "emancipation" former slaves were forced into serfdom, as most of these rural freedmen ended up as sharecroppers. These African-americans were promised "forty acres and a mule". Instead, under the Andrew Johnson presidency, most of the Southern land was restored to their former owners.

§During the reconstruction of America African-americans saw their greatest prominance in the American political system, with sixteen black men in Congress, two in the Senate, and many others in various state conventions and legislatures. Between 1877 and 1900 blacks were again victimized this time by the Republican party "guaranteer" of black political freedom. The party withdrew its support and gave the white south freerdom to deal with the black population, as it saw fit. Already terronst enforced disfranchisement of the black vote became legal as Southern states passed voting restrictions such as, the "good conduct", and "grandfather" clauses. Along with legal disfranchisment came legal segregation first in the field of public education then in transportation. In 1896 Plessy v. Fergusonthe Supreme Court ruled that "separate but equal" facilities were permissible. By the time of the First World War segregation was legally maintained in almost all areas of social contact.

§Economically, African-americans were being pushed out of traditional jobs as a mass influx of white immigrant labor poured into the country. At the end of the Civil War five of every six artisans in the South were black, by 1900 only one of every twenty was black. There were groups that sought to organize black and white skilled, and non skilled; such as the Knights of Labor. However, this organization was supplanted by the American Federation of Labor which eventually excluded all African-americans from membership. Politically, the Populist party tried to unify poor black and white farmers but this philosophy of cooperation did not remain as populist leaders soon shifted emphasis from interracial cooperation to vicious race hatred.

§At the turn of the century Booker T. Washington, a former slave, emerged on the scene as one of America's "first" great black leaders. The American political and financial power structure helped him reach national prominence, as they approved of his emphasize on thrift and hard work and his down playing of political and social rights. In contrast to Washington emerged a voice which would criticize America and the supposed leaders of the black race. This voice belonged to William Edward Burghardt DuBois, an honest man who realized the need for separate economic and political control of black communities as African-americans strove for equality. Yet, to come was Marcus Garvey who would advocate the needs for an independent nation.

Victory against Racism at WFCR

Hispanics, together with the overall third world community and its supporters, are at last victorious in an important year long struggle.

Five College radio station WFCR's attacks on third world programming and representation have finally been redressed in an agreement reached between UMass (which holds the station's license) and the Coalition for Public Involvement in Public Radio. Tony Crayton, a spokesperson for the Coalition, claims that no clearer, more concrete and satisfactory victory has been achieved by third world people in this area in the last ten years.

Background to the struggle

The struggle began when WFCR general manager Robert Goldfarb announced cutbacks in Hispanic programming. The Coalition was formed as a result of third world and progressive organizations in the area joining to defend Hispanic programming on WFCR.

The Coalition held a two-day peaceful occupation of the Chancellor's office in April, after having exhausted all bureaucratic channels with Goldfarb, the University, and the Western Massachusetts Broadcasting Council (WMBC-the station's supervisory board). In June all agreements reached at the end of the occupation, between the Coalition and WFCR, were broken.

The Hispanic program Que Tal Amigos, which had been on the air for a decade, was taken off the air. Neither the Coalition nor the WFCR Hispanic advisory board were consulted.

Que Tal Amigos was a nationally acclaimed program and had listeners all over western Massachusetts. By June not only was the program off the air, but two Hispanic producers (Sonia Vivas and Julio Torres) and a Black producer (Jose Tolson) had resigned because of racism at WFCR.

In spite of the Coalition's efforts during the summer months to address the situation, negotiations with Goldfarb and the WMBC broke down repeatedly. Both Goldfarb and the WMBC failed to honor the agreements made at the end of the April occupation or to provide any means of redress.

Among the Coalition's demands were that a full time Hispanic producer be hired to replace the producers of Que Tal Amigos; that the six hours of Hispanic programming be reinstated; that the role to the WMBC as a governing body be terminated, and that minority staff be hired by the station.

Coalition prepares legal action

These demands were met with vague promises which skirted the issue. During this time the Coalition began to prepare a petition to deny WFCR's license renewal by the Federal Communications Commission.

Memos were sent in July of 1980 to the Chancellor and the Provost through the WMBC notifying them of the Coalition's intention to challenge the station's license. Still no efforts to establish substantial negotiations were initiated.

In late December the Coalition's negotiating team was contacted through their attorney by the law firm working for the station on the license renewal application. Having caught wind of the strength of the petition they asked the Coalition not to submit it and that the dispute be resolved by negotiations with the University.

After this initiative, negotiations were set up with Miriam Williford, the Chancellor's representative, who was determined to cut through bureaucratic obstacles to a resolution. An agreement was reached on Thursday, Feb. 12, just a few days before the Coalition's petition was due to be filed.

What has been won

The agreement represented a significant victory for the Hispanic community and for the efforts of Hispanics, Blacks and progressive whites to work in a coalition. The concessions made by the University in some respects exceeded the original demands the Coalition had made in April.

Not only were the six hours of third world programming restored (4 hours of Hispanic programming and a 2 hour increase for a minority public affairs program), but the producer of Pan Afrique, Karl Njiri, was offered a full-time position as of June 1st.

The station must also apply for a minority training grant and other funding in order to increase the third world staff at WFCR. The supervision of the station has been transferred out of the Provost's office and into the hands of Dr. Williford.

The WMBC had its accounts transferred to the WFCR trust fund which is held and managed by the University. Thus the WMBC will no longer act as a governing body. Its advisory role will be further clarified in view of the University's commitment to the active involvement of the Community Advisory Board (CAB).

The strengthening of the CAB's role and the declining role of the WMBC makes channels for community input greater. Two third world representatives, Luis Fuentes and Mary McHenry, are currently on the board, which is now accepting applications for membership and encouraging third world people to apply.

Triumph for all

The Coalition's efforts will now focus on ensuring community access to the radio through contact with the CAB and on following through the University's compliance with the agreements made.

This has been a year-long struggle which has involved the draining efforts of many people. It has brought unity in the third world community and has been a triumph for all. When asked whether the Hispanic community would have been able to resolve the dispute without recourse to legal means, Jose Bou of the Coalition's negotiating team, answered as follows:

"The struggle would have been more strenuous and would have required greater unity and organization among the various Hispanic organizations, such as Ahora, Patria Libre, the Bilingual Collegiate Program and Casa Latina. Another attack on the station might have been necessary to resolve the problem."

Voting Rights worse in Thurmond's home county

Atlanta,GA. (MIS)--An Atlanta newspaper has revealed that one of the worst counties for voting rights for black people in South Carolina is Edgefield County--the home of United States Senator Strom Thurmond.

Thurmond has announced plans to try to kill the 1965 Voting Rights Act this year. The Senator is the rnw chairman of the powerful Senate Judiciary Committee.

In a copyrighted story released last week, The Atlanta Consitution said that in spite of having a majority-black population, Edgefield has no black members on its County Council. Edgefield is the only one of 13 majority-black counties in South Carolina that has no black elected officials on its governing body.

Edgefield County is a small, rural county on the Georgia border just northeast of Augusta. The county has had a long and violent history of racism and repression of Black Freedom. It was also the home of "Pitchfork" Ben Tillman, the governor and United States Senator who led the drive in the late 1800s to take the vote away from black people in South Carolina.

Black activists in Edgefield County have spent the past 7 years in federal court trying to prove that the county's at-large election system discriminates against black voters. The group has charged that Edgefield public officials have violated portions of the Voting Rights Act.

The Constitution article quoted United States District Judge Robert Chapman as saying that there was a "strong history of official segretation and discrimination" in Edgefield County, and said that "blacks were virtually totally excluded (from the political process) up to 1970." The Judge said that since 1970, black political progress in Edgefield County has been only "minimal tokenism".

Thurmond, who opposed the Voting Rights Act when it was originally considered by Congress in 1965, has said that the act is "unconstitutional and unnecessary." The Senator was quoted by the Constitution as saying, "there is no discrimination of any kind" in South Carolina.

Congressman Mitchell blasts treatment of Blacks in America

Orangeburg, S.C. --Black Marland Congressman Parren Mitchell says that black people are hostages in America and bear "deep-seated psychological scars" from 300 years of captivity in this country. Mitchell told an audience of students at South Carolina State College in Orangeburg this week that black people should be given the same kind of medical care and psychological treatment that was given the former Iranian hostages when they arrived in Germany.

The Congressman was speaking at the 13th annual Memorial Service for the three black students who were murdered by South Carolina Highway Patrol officers at South Carolina State College in 1968.

Mitchell blasted the present treatment of black people in this country, saying that discrimination and racism are on the rise.

"We see the scum that is the KKK," the Congressman said. "But they must be made to understand that there is a new generation of black people." He said that black people "must turn back to the Old Testament and remember that there is 'an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth.'" He was interrupted by applause. Mitchell also criticized the "hidden racists in the 3-piece suits who never say they don't like anyone, but who can find 10,000 reasons not to hire a graduate of a black college.

Pointing to recent trials in Miami where white police officer s were acquitted of murdering a black man and black men were convicted of murdering whites, Mitchell said that there ws a double standard of justice in this country.

Fort Apache, The Bronx

A Review

by Donna Davis
Nummo Staff

Fort Apache is a vivid startling and very unrealistic portrayal of life in the South Bronx, its inhabitants are shown one right after the other. The opening scene shows a prostitute high on angel dust, shooting two police officers to death. The next scene is equally shocking. A homosexual threatens to jump off of a building and when he is talked out of it he blows kisses to the cheering crowd. Afterwards he is taken to the local hospital and cries pathetically, "I'm all messed up."

Later in the movie the same prostitute slices the throat of a potential customer. It seems that the lady dislikes johns as well as cops. The movie does not attempt to explain or give insight into her actions. Thus she is reduced to the same mentality of the mad killer in My Bloody Valentine.

In another scene the two hero cops burst into an apartment. They are greeted by a dozen people babbling in Spanish who can't explain what the problem is. The two cops then find afourteen year old who is about to have a baby. Believe it or not she was able to hide her pregnancy from all twelve members of her family for nine months.

After viewing the first fifteen minutes of Fort Apache, one feels as though he has just witnessed a bizarre imitation of a circus. The movie is not only unrealistic but degrading as well. While it is true that there is much filth and illicit behavior in the Bronx, the film exaggerates the issue. The characters in Fort Apache are not well developed and it is difficult for the audience to empathize with them. Instead, viewers are left with flat negative impressions of Bronx life and its people.

Before the film begins the producers placed a short announcement that states that the movie is not trying to discredit people or groups that are trying to turn theBronx around. That concise message does not and cannot make up for the film's shortcomings. Instead of trying to create a disturbing violent portrait of the Bronx, David Susskind and his associates should have shown the people that are working to build a better community. They also should have incorporated characters that can be understood from a humanistic perspective.

The new police captain played by Edward Asner does try to shake up the Bronx. However, his efforts are negated when his new methods succeed in causing a riot in front of the precinct. During that riot a young Puerto Rican is thrown off a roof by two police officers. This unjust murder is witnessed by Murphy, played by Paul Newman and his partner. However,Newman does not turn in his fellow officers until the very end of the movie. Thus viewers are left with the mistaken impression that a blonde haired blue eyed angel will take the first traumatic step towards making the Bronx more livable.

Three Jeers for Ruling Class

As the second season of the TV networks unfolds, it is clear that a new focus is on the ruthless business ventures and seedy personal lives of the filthy rich.

ABC's Dynasty and NBC's Flamingo Road joined top-rated and much-promoted Dallas of CBS in the story of Big Oil, big money, and utter decadence. The shows are just all too believable.

By depicting on screen such spiteful creatures as J.R. (Dallas) and Blake Carrington (Dynasty), the networks are certainly finding a vent for popular anger at the oil companies' never-ending ripoffs of our hard-earned wages.

As the oil tycoons and their toadies scrap tooth and nail for greater wealth and glory, no tactic seems too vile in the struggle--if it works. Power itself has hardly ever seemed so thoroughly rotten. Cutthroat competition, bribery, corruption, and the drive for greater riches appear to be the moving force in industry--a necessary evil to grease the economic wheels and keep them turning. But that's the big falsehood in these incredible programs.

In their rush to overwhelm us with excitement and gore, the networks forgot the most important characters in the world of high finance and industry--those whose hard work makes it all possible. There's hardly a single working person portrayed in any of these shows. Not one character does any really productive work. Each is too busy skimming the cream. What happened to us?

While the super-rich are portrayed in all their ugly splendor, working people are either strictly background material or are just absent altogether. This is a world where the tables and floors are always cleaned, the food is always cooked, the mansions are always built and maintained in just the right way--and the oil is pumped out of the ground at a steady rate. All taken completely for granted.

Where do these fine things come from? Are the the result of raging greed? Are the servants driven by relentless ambition? Do office or factory workers labor in a mad quest for power and wealth at another's expense? What would happen if assembly line workers kicked and bit each other on the way to a finished product? The fact is, the working class works together every working day.

Society depends on the cooperative efforts of all of us to produce what is needed--that's what makes it all go. The activities of the industrial barons are nothing but a very dead weight. The characters of Dallas, Dynasty, and Flamingo Road reveal an entire group of people who would benefit society best if they were put out of business altogether. (Too bad Kristin didn't have better aim!)

U.S. preparing for future Vietnams

Reprinted from the Guardian

Amid the verbal barrage of warlike talk along the potomac last week, the U.S. government took two actions of a more concrete nature--both with little publicity.

The first was what the Pentagon called "the most comprehensive exercise of strategic readiness ever undertaken." Carried out by the Strategic Air Command (SAC), the bomber unit which delivers nuclear bombs in the event of a nuclear war, the exercise began Jan. 26. It will last 20 days, involve 100,000 soldiers and will simulate nuclear attacks against "hypothetical enemy targets," the Pentagon added.

The test had been planned under the Carter administration, but was approved by President Reagan as well. The Pentagon said the test "is not related to any real world situation."

Almost simultaneous with the SAC exercise, the leading unit within the Pentagon's Rapid Deployment Force(RDF) was staging a mock "counterinsurgency war" in the Mojave Desert in California.

Some 6000 Marines staged the mock battle in the first test of the new unit's combat capability. The RDF was formed a year ago with the mission of intervening in the Mideast--or any other area--where "U.S. vital interests are threatened."

RDF'S REAL PURPOSE

The most common scenario conjured up has the Soviet Union invading Iran or Saudi Arabia from Afghanistan in order to cut off the West's oil supply. The RDF would be airlifted in to dislodge the Soviets.

But the exercises in the Mojave Desert last week were conducted under a very different set of hypothetical circumstances. "The exercise does not presume confrontation with Soviet troops," Pentagon spokesman Col. David Mason told the Guardian. "The script has a fictional 'Elon People's Army' seizing a piece of territory from a pro-Western Arab country. They're Soviet-backed of course, with weapons. The job of the Marines in this exercise is to crush the People's Army and secure the area until reinforcement arrive."

Mason's remarks are the first explicit indication that the RDF would be used primarily to suppress a liberation movement rather than combat a Soviet invasion.

Col. Robert Wakefield, commander of the exercise, said: "This is as close as we'll get to the real thing without someone shooting back. If we'd had this experience in Vietnam, we'd have lost fewer men."

Asserted RDF commander Gen. P.X. Kelly, "The morale of our troops is extremely high, especially in the wake of the Iran situation. If we're called on, we can do the job."

Big Business cheers on Reagan as Affirmative Action Programs under siege

February 2--As though racist discrimination and the fight to overcome it are the same. Ronald Reagan told reporters at his news conference on Thursday that he is opposed to affirmative action quote systems, because I'm old enough to remember when quotas existed in the United States for the purpose of discrimination. And I don't want to see that happen again."

Reagan was referring to quotas designed to limit the number of Jewish people and other immigrant nationalities in the U.S. colleges and medical schools. What he conveniently left out was that while these were unfair quotas aimed at perpetuating exclusionary practices, today's affirmative action programs open up jobs and places in schools for those who have been traditionally excluded.

Far from being imposed on the victims of discrimination, affirmative action quotas were won through the struggle against the real quota system, the hidden one that recognizes only wealth, privilege, and family name and that sytematically excludes Black, Latin, Asian, and Native people and women.

Certainly, if Reagan had the slightest concern about discrimination, he and his fellow Cabinet members would resign from the exclusive California-based Bohemian Club that keeps out all black people and women.

In reality Reagan's remarks were a signal that he is going to make the racist lie of "reverse discrimination" official policy. "Reverse discrimination" has been the legal device that bigots across the country have used to dismantle the limited legal gains won by black people in their struggle for equality in employment and education. The fact is that instead of becoming 'discriminators," as Reagan tries to claim, black people face a growing gap between their income and that of whites and black communities have been increasingly victimized by racist violence and terror.

Discrimination rules halted

If anyone didn't get Reagan's message, the Department of Labor drove it home with the almost simultaneous announcement that new job discrimination rules would not go into effect as scheduled. Affected are a broad range of regulations including those strengthening sex discrimination protection, treating pregnancy as a disability, and extending affirmative action requirements.

The new protective measures had been slated to go into effect even earlier, but Carter, trying to appease the right-wing, had postponed the regulations until after Jan. 1, leaving the path clear for the Reagan administration to scuttle them.

The Labor Department announcement comes on the heels of a report by Reagan aides calling for the virtual abandonment of affirmative action. Prepared by Reagan's Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) transition team, the report also proposes a one year freeze on lawsuits and new guidelines introduced by the commission, and that workers filing suit against discriminatory practices not be allowed to point to clear patterns of exclusion, but be required to prove "intent to discriminate."

Ruling class behind attacks

Whether or not this report is adopted, it represents not just the views of a tiny Reaganite faction, but powerful figures in the U.S. ruling class as a whole. This can be seen in Friday's Wall Street Journal, the organ of U.S. finance capital, which openly admits that the report "reflects attitudes of critics in the business community."

Indeed it is the capitalist ruling class itself that also benefits from discrimination, especially during a time of economic crisis. Anxious to divert a strong, united working-class struggle, the bosses want to make white workers think their losses are due to the minimal social gains won by oppressed workers in the past.

All working people are suffering today from unemployment, high prices, deteriorating housing, and unbearable cuts in vital social services. To mount an effective offensive against these worsening conditions, the entire working class must first of all defend the rights of the poorest and most oppressed. The fight to defend affirmative action provides the opportunity for forging the unity necessary for a successful struggle against the general assault on the standard of living of the entire working class.

Samaurai Night Fever or the Japan-isation of America

by Richard Mei, Jr. Nummo Staff

From an old "Saturday Night Live" several years back, John Belushi parodied "John Travolta and the film "Saturday Night Fever through one of his popular samurai skits, Belushi gave us his amusing version of the film, wearing a kimono and sword and speaking something that tried to sound like Japanese. Since the "Samurai fever" has really caught on in America, especially following the immense popularity of the book and television version of "Shogun" Soon after Shogun was aired, movie theaters in New York City held a month long samurai film festival that featured classic and some not so classic samurai films. A classic B movie called "Shogun Assassin," appeared while "Kagemusha", the new film by Akira Kurosawa opened to long lines on New York and other cities. Bookstores, specialize in, again basically "in", following a growing popular trend toward anything Eastern, especially Japanese culture.

In recent years, Americans have been becoming fond Japan, not especially to how the Japanese dominated from American industry even was hundred years ago, Japanese in America are rapidly seen nowadays not just wearing by adopting and dressing well, but even including the Japanese life style, "Wabi-sabi," Yamato Damashi, Nikkei-Jinkan and Subo-sabishisu", however we are more and more people, both young and old starting to wear kimon, reading books on Zen, using chopsticks, sleeping on futons and wearing yukatas (Some even invent their own strange variations--for instance, some women have been seen with chopsticks "artistically"placed in their hair!) One only has to pick up the Valley Advocate or walk down Main Street, Northampton to evidence the extent of Japanese influences: Futons on sale, Shiatsu treatments, learning aikido, buying shoji screens,or just look at the greater number of people now eating with "sticks" in the dining commons or natural food restaurants.

At first, Asians might be saying, Americans have finally begun to learn something from the East, although a limited version of the American scene is disturbing, one hopes that is not all superficial but has some substance. Whether it is glorifying samurais or eating raw fish, Americans must realize that there is more to Japan and the Japanese than merely those images that they choose to consume. Behind each culture is ancient, sophisticated philosophy and religions whose harmony between nature and man, it's really philosophy the Japanese or for that matter any other nationality or culture, one must make the effort to see through the superficial aspects and simplifications of popular trends.

Adopting elements of Japanese culture and learning from the East is great, but only if done so with honest sincerity and to degree of depth.

Nikkei Unite!
A Progressive Strategy for Redress

In recent years, many groups and individuals have become involved in the issue of the wartime incarceration of Japanese Americans. Nikkei of all generations and background are coming together in their common belief that some amends must be made for the injustice. Although there is great basic unity on the issue, varying approaches to it have been taken or proposed. Most are efforts to find a policy which will unite and lead the community. Japanese Community Progressive Alliance(JCPA) and the Little Tokyo People's Rights Organization(LTPRO) would like to present our views on the movement for redress and reparations, and on how to approach the upcoming struggle.

History

The movement for reparations redress (H.R. 5499) goes back a long way. The 1988 Executive Claims Act was the first attempt to gain compensation for the Camps as a sentence. However, it couldn't be considered adequate in full in the intentions. The $4,000 compensation received only symbolic on the 1988 signing, and the funds were limited to "eligible survivors" and considerably discriminated issue. It took generations' years before the last of these payments were written.

Through the years, the camps experience has been the focus of community discussions and reflection. A grassroot were given Senator Inouye's call to have the government issue a apology and to have the government establish a major study commemorating the incarceration. At the birth of the Asian American movement in the States, the camps were identified as a major experience shaping Asian American and Japanese American identity. Annual pilgrimages to the campsites were organized, and the Manzanar Committee and Tule Lake Committee were formed. The concentration camps spawned a wealth of creative works, poetry, plays, films, publications, classes and programs. A campaign was successfully fought to remove the word "evacuation" from the textbooks, and some of the most favorable out of WWII, which authorized the present and future use of concentration camps, in 1976 President Gerald Ford was pressured to revoke Executive Order 9066, which sent the internees to the camps in the first place. The stage has been set, present in the hearts and minds of Japanese America.

In the 1970s, the Japanese American Citizens League(JACL) took up the redress issue as a major campaign. At its 1978 National Convention in Salt Lake City, JACL members voted overwhelmingly for monetary compensation of $25,000 per person interned. In June of 1980, the JACL was instrumental in obtaining legislation to establish a fact-finding Commission on Wartime Relocation. During this same period,theNational Council for Japanese American Redress (NCJAR) was formed in Seattle, and subsequently a bill to be introduced in Congress by Representative Mike Lowry. This bill calls for individual monetary compensation of $15,000 and $15,000 per heir of all internees.

Grassroots Organizing

JCPA and LTPRO have also played an active role in this mobilization. Our emphasis has been on grassroots organizing in the community and bringing together all those who can be considered as the Nikkei people.

In 1978, JCPA initiated the Fair Lens Committee, which has sponsored three delegations to the concentration camps and has held the foundation for future work in Northern California. LTPRO participated in pilgrimages to Manzanar and took in forming the Los Angeles Community Coalition for Reparations(LACJAR).

Have developed our basic policy on the U.S. Alien Decline to Speak on Justice in South Africa

Alice Sachs a well known South African lawyer and writer, specializing on international and family law, will speak on several occasions in Western Mass. on Thursday, February 26th.

Sachs will be the guest of a noon-time brown-bag luncheon at the Northampton Unitarian Church, 220 Main st., Northampton and child care will be provided. At 4:30 pm she will speak on "Our Knots of Solidarity: South Africa and Beyond" in Thompson Hall, Room 162 at the University of Massachusetts. Finally at 7:30 p.m. in the East Lecture Hall of Franklin Pierce Hall, she will address the topic " Justice in South Africa."

Born and educated in South Africa Mrs. Sachs practiced law on the Cape Town bar for nine years, during which time she became active in anti-apartheid activities. She was jailed twice without trial for this work and, in 1966, left South Africa. She remains in exile, teaching law in Western Europe and collaborating in a governmental effort to reclaim the history of that country.

During and after the Commission hearings, we plan to continue to broaden the support for H.R. and the five Principles of Unity of the NCRR. We will pursue other legal avenues in obtaining fulfillment of our demands, and will continue to work with JCPA and LTPRO.

Future Work

Clearly, the struggle for H.R.442 has a long way without over. It will take a mass campaign of efforts and commitment from all who support the idea. It will take wide organization and strength in numbers. LTPRO and JCPA recognize that in order to win, all the forces involved must be united and there must be as much input and participation as possible.

Through the NCRR, we are attempting to build that unity and involvement among the majority of Nikkei who may desire justice and compensation, this can only be done if the movement is truly rooted among the people. Our work has proven that in order to win democratic, we must respond and rely on mass support, not the "good deed" of a handful of politicians. We must organize to educate diverse people of different social and political backgrounds. There will be differences among the people as to the exact amount of compensation and the methods for obtaining our goals. Some, for instance, may want to concentrate on the redress issue, while others may concentrate on a broader goal. We believe that such differences of view, which are natural in any complex issue, can and must be put together within the united front for reparations and redress. The point is that people can and are uniting around the common goal of seeking true justice is done after almost forty years.

The movement for reparations redress concerns an issue that affects all Asians in this country. Our ability to take one strong, united voice will be tested throughout the campaign. We can and must show that we are ready to reconcile it we are to win justice and reparations now!

RACISM IN THE MEDIA
How America Sees Us

by Satinder Nahnik

Whether exactly all of us has had experience of not being able to find pennies, knowing and running on real hostile goon existed, we got out of bed trying to find something to do. We were often raised on TV and watch the late night, it makes us shudder to watch stories of a difference was. Watching the late "Public enemy" an action adventure of Japanese soldiers not only single handed but commanded assisting both comedy, crying to "Across the Pacific", fabulous-looked and effortlessly Charlie Chan, somehow solving mystic and complicated murders by relating into famous "Confucius say" and by only Confucius was also to fool on and down and dusty, Sinclair Lewis with their "Yasuo Mori", a cruelty to mind the uncomparable - whatever we who are of white supremacy was understood. While watching carefully at a regular and weighted pattern of a regular and weighted pattern of Western caricature on screen. It was the white man who got up the American nation and assisted to enough the self glorifying concept of Manifest Destiny. The minority was at no consequence except perhaps for some comic relief.

Hate has silenced and silenced hate for we have attempted worse than ever. The civil rights movement, greater awareness of minority feelings and consciousness has been seen. But existing carefully at material coming out of subculture these days, have we really advanced? What Approach to the Commission hearing?

The Presidential Study Commission on the Wartime Relocation will hold public hearings in early 1981 in cities across the U.S. where there are significant Japanese populations. The Commission's sole purpose is to determine whether or not an injustice was committed against the Japanese during the wartime incarceration and relocation. WE BELIEVE THAT THIS IS A FOREGONE CONCLUSION. The burden of proof should be on those to not upon the Japanese. Why must we prove that the suspension of all constitutional and democratic rights of 110,000 people was unjust" is the horrible serious incarceration and destruction of entire communities on the basis of national origin? "Military necessity" cannot be the denial of our language, culture and true history in the country unjust? Were the issues economic, psychological, physical anything other than an staggering fact that Japanese non-aliens have never occurred even to this day?

While this is occur, we will utilize the Commission hearings as a vehicle to express our demands for H.R. We plan to be both inside and outside the hearings. We will use the media to put forth our views, and we will help people prepare to testify at the hearings. While we want to ensure that the community voice is heard, we realize that our testimony will be allowed to participate. We want the American public to know where we stand on this important issue.

The Commission can only make recommendations and does not have the power to appropriate money. Here are our concepts of a fact-based plan to continue to put pressure on the government after the hearings have come and gone. To build the level of participation in the movement after the life of the Commission will be a difficult an important undertaking. We must keep Nationwide in our minds the lessons we've learned over the years. It may be years before any congress action will be taken in particular, we must rely on the spirit, creativity and anger of the majority of Japanese who want what is rightfully theirs.

Reagan:
Looking for a new title for an old story

by Gertrudis Garcia
Nummo Staff

The Reagan Administration is using an old story in order to increase not only the credibility of the Nation, but also the nation's spending of the United States. The old story consists of blaming the Soviet Union for the emergency in most Third World countries. We know about the McCarthy era. Although the cause of that era was the preoccupation of the government by communism (according to McCarthy), this can be used as an example of how a whole nation was manipulated by the Red Scare propaganda presented by the U.S. government.

Today the story that government agents are using,continues the communist agents is not going to have the same effect of awakening the American people behind the administration in the Senate or the White House. Because of this the Reagan's administration is playing just the role of the old story.

This time, instead of calling it RED SCARE, THE U.S. GOVERNMENT AGENTS, are now using the term of the NEW INTERNATIONAL AL QAEDA. The Reagan administration needs an excuse for outrage its military expenditures at the same time it cuts programs of social welfare. I imagine that the administration thought the way they were going to increase the domestic economy in Third World countries as the formation of democratic processes for the future control.

In Canada,as the best example I can use to generate my point. The Reagan administration, since his first days took over control, generated a hard stance in its foreign policies. I have to point out that the hard stance is also in relation to consumers that have a different system of government as the one today's Canada. In the case of the Soviet Union and Nicaragua, in Central America, the U.S. administration of Massachusetts. Finally at 7:30 p.m. in the East Lecture Hall of Franklin Pierce Hall, he will address the topic " Justice in South Africa."

Born and educated in South Africa Mrs. Sachs practiced law on the Cape Town bar for nine years, during which time she became active in anti-apartheid activities. She was jailed twice without trial for this work and, in 1966, left South Africa. She remains in exile, teaching law in Western Europe and collaborating in a governmental effort to reclaim the history of that country.

of the first when the administration of people were on the streets to greet them. Those masses of people are proof that the propaganda is working at home, was something how to be done in order to get the world attention, proved to be the U.S. is accusing the Soviet Union of having involved in El Salvador at the same time that powers intervention (US) in Grenada is one of the powers.

The Reagan administration knows the truth. The reason for the number of US Salvador is not a right between the communist left and common right, with a "moderate" party in the middle. The Salvadorean people are not especially fighting among themselves as the American media wants us to see. The Salvadorean people are fighting against military forces, which although supported by Salvadoreans, are commanded by the right wing personal in operations, assists and supported by economic interests from abroad.

When the Reagan administration is saying is that the Soviet Union is giving arms to leftist guerrillas and that is a distinct way U.S. to support the governing powers to prevent the disruption of democracy as in Salvador.

Using the old story which presents the Soviet Union as a monster that feeds on destruction, dictatorship and oppression of other peoples, the United States intends to gain the support of, and unite Americans to accept the sacrifices in the creation to economic programs in the countries of the south. The U.S. government wants people to support for spending money payable to El Salvador to protect the "underdeveloped" Salvadoreans from the Red Monster.

It is my belief that the American people understand that the story of red attacks communism in the pursuit of the outrageous which the economic and military elite of the nation suffer from as a result of losing their imperialist control. They have of control is not time to now. Reagan from another proposition power had also to the efforts of third world nations to

It is also very noted that the American youth is trying to now the real story and what's the real enemy. The story is that one which has been Cuba, Grenada, Nicaragua and Salvador. Reagan and his men do not know that the American people are not willing to be conscripted into wars of intervention. I can that the belief is that the American youth wants to hear the real story because I understand that the U.S. establishment spokesmen and media is during no part of the country now ready for people so that they can hear only the "Evil Empire" told a story and not the reality that other people around the world are living.

I can wish to tell Reagan and Mr. Haig because they and have to tell the other political party if they want to call since they are the American people and the U.S. also should all their intentions at the front about.

Who got The Latin vote?

According to the San Antonio-based Southwest Voter Registration/Educational Project, former President Jimmy Carter received the lowest percentage of Latino votes of any Democrat in 20 years while President Ronald Reagan polled at a record percentage.

The results of Latino voting trends in 43 states showed that Carter received 56 percent of the vote to Reagan's 29 per cent in 1976. Carter received 8 per cent of the Latino vote to 6 percent for former Republican President Gerald Ford. The reverse Carter to Reagan swing is also prevalent in Democratic-held 8 percent points from the 1976 general election, while Reagan picked up 32 percent more Latino votes than Ford did four years ago.

The success of Latino votes for a Republican candidate does not mean Reagan has a "clear mandate" by out have some services and programs and is the run down of the Latino communities, development of Latino communities throughout the U.S. In fact, Reagan received 25 percent of the 45 percent of eligible Latino voters and actually voted.

Latinos, like all other U.S. citizens, totally voted according to income. The highly conservative Cuban American vote of Florida, for instance, supported Reagan, giving Cubans in Florida the highest 58 percent of the vote. The highest percentage given him by any Latino group. Cuban Americans have the highest median family income, $9,526 of all Latino groups.

Coupled with a family median income of $ 7,000, Mexican-Americans rejected Reagan in Texas. The former Texas governor received 39 percent of the vote, in New Mexico 36 percent, in California 35 percent, in Colorado 30 percent and in Arizona 34 per cent.

Puerto Ricans, with the lowest median family income of $6,200, largely concentrated in New York, were the least likely to vote for Reagan. In the predominantly Puerto Rican state of New York no terms of the Reagan administration received among the lowest percentage of any other state. Even here, Chicano and Puerto Rican communities in Chicago, Reagan fared the second receiving only 9 percent of the vote.

MYTHS ON PUERTO RICAN MIGRATION

by Hector Biaggi Nummo Staff

The emigration of Puerto Ricans to the United States reflects the economic realities of Puerto Rico, its colonial education playing an important role in the overall relationship. There are many concepts or myths that the media uses in order to explain this phenomena:

First
Puerto Rico is an overpopulated nation and there is too many people in the small island

Second
these people, like all many others groups in the past, eventually will find their way in the land of opportunities which is called the U. S. having evolved on it's behalf at the same time that powers intervention (US) in Grenada is one of the powers.

The Reagan administration knows the truth. The reason for the number of US Salvador is not a right between the communist left and common right, with a "moderate" party in the middle. The Salvadorean people are not especially fighting among themselves as the American media wants us to see. The Salvadorean people are fighting against military forces, which although supported by Salvadoreans, are commanded by the right wing personal in operations, assists and supported by economic interests from abroad.

When the Reagan administration is saying is that the Soviet Union is giving arms to leftist guerrillas and that is a distinct way U.S. to support the governing powers to prevent the disruption of democracy as in Salvador.

Using the old story which presents the Soviet Union as a monster that feeds on destruction, dictatorship and oppression of other peoples, the United States intends to gain the support of, and unite Americans to accept the sacrifices in the creation to economic programs in the countries of the south. The U.S. government wants people to support for spending money payable to El Salvador to protect the "underdeveloped" Salvadoreans from the Red Monster.

It is my belief that the American youth understand that the story of red attacks communism in the pursuit of the outrageous which the economic and military elite of the nation suffer from as a result of losing their imperialist control. They have of control is not time to now. Reagan from another proposition power had also to the efforts of third world nations to

It is also very noted that the American youth is trying to now the real story and what's the real enemy. The story is that one which has been Cuba, Grenada, Nicaragua and Salvador. Reagan and his men do not know that the American people are not willing to be conscripted into wars of intervention. I can that the belief is that the American youth wants to hear the real story because I understand that the U.S. establishment spokesmen and media is during no part of the country now ready for people so that they can hear only the "Evil Empire" told a story and not the reality that other people around the world are living.

I can wish to tell Reagan and Mr. Haig because they and have to tell the other political party if they want to call since they are the American people and the U.S. also should all their intentions at the front about.

Second
these people, like all many others groups in the past, eventually will find their way in the land of opportunities which is called the U. S. having evolved on it's behalf at the same time that powers intervention (US) in Grenada is one of the powers.

Overpopulation, as defined by Malthus, is when the resources of the environment fails to produce the amount of food needed to support a given population. We can not say that "new York City" is overpopulated, however, Cambodia, Tanzania, Bangladesh and many other Third World countries with their huge land extensions, can be called overpopulated areas according to Malthus. But this problem can not be explained by mere biological considerations, as Marx said. Economics and politics are undoubtly linked to the problem, which is cast to say that there is a high population density in our planet. I can assume that the amazing advances we connect, then we must consolidate in Puerto Rico, as in many Third World countries there is no overpopulation at all. Instead, there is an unequal distribution of the Earth's wealth.

In the particular colonial case of Puerto Rico, which is the second native of importance to the U.S. in America one time being Canada), the lack of employment resulted in the huge waves of emigration that followed the famous "Operation Bootstrap", initiated during the 50's by the colonial government. Taking in account the amount of capital accumulated on the island and the wealth that the owners of companies governors in their colonial country, it is necessary to talk about overpopulation in Puerto Rico.

In order to present an explained situation, the colonial administration attempted the need to migrate to the U.S., where many unemployed Puerto Ricans could "solve" their problems and also help to their families. Migration does not just explain the solution of the problem, but also the cause of it. Migration is a way to escape from the colonial reality, where the economic and political decisions are made by the U.S. government and the local colonial administration. Migration is a way to escape from the colonial reality, where the economic and political decisions are made by the U.S. government and the local colonial administration.

Also is now dominant, the Black community which have been living in the continent since the colonization, in the mid-19th or (Jewish communities) Yet, the opportunities that are available to the Afro-American sector are less than to those given to other ethnic groups. Racism plays a decisive role in the "American Paradise." The kind of opportunities is only a misconception.

The only way our community could find its way in the society is by means of education, directed not only to surpass, but also to the American people. The Bronze role in social progress, the ever increasing cost of higher education, the amount of money directed to the military and more recently the new wave of racism which is threatening our existence must be fought. Education, if not violence, is the answer in the book is.

REPORTERS HONESTY

Robinson accused the reporters of trying to speak out and let white America know how they look to us, outside of their own mere image. "White America has no desire to look at itself, much less how it looks to people." To them, Racism is a small fact which is merely a bit too great.

Robinson said he hopes to make a documentary on white America through the eyes of Afro-American.

So don't you love that one documentary could jeopardize your reputation as a journalist and your job as well? As it is my friend.

Is there racial animosity from your colleagues,Ted Koppel, Frank Reynolds, etc.?

No, I don't think so. The essential problem here is those who do speak out.

Do you see as are among journalists more willing to speak out? If they commit the crime? They don't want our picture in the news. Steve Wasnky had a fantastic turnout in Washington D.C. to try to make Martin Luther King's birthday a national holiday and it was only televised locally.

most of the nation didn't even know what happened.

At this most and where you go to school.

Columbia, get involved now, so then more how can feel.

Knowing the network was to encourage black journalists from taking about news, who do you continue to do so?

Let me think it.

The people at ABC gave Robinson to use the "one million dollar", and this one of the english language to impute their views and most of his skin. Many people who are now on TV make some real and relevant comments, and continue to do so.

There is many racial animosity from your colleagues,Ted Koppel, Frank Reynolds, etc.?

No, I don't think so. The essential problem here is those who do speak out.

A Gold Rush for the 80's

...Africa is a common knowledge, it seems, that gold has been appreciated for its beauty and permanence by many societies since ancient times. It probably, however, most of us had learnt in the role of the mysterious world in hand just by where it was consolidation the mysterious American gold rush and the opening of South Africa's legendary goldfields.

In fact, the many controversies about Africa and the centre has made in the previous metal, supplying nearly all of Europe's gold until the discovery of the New World. Great west African empires were built on a lucrative trans-Saharan trade: the one in Ewre the ...ple, lasted the price of Egypt's gold ...ased dear for several years, as large sum the discovery of gold brought into the country for gifts and payments!

West Africa failed as a major force in the gold trade after the prominent fluctuations in the U.S., Australia and South Africa in the mid and late 1800s. Some of the region's larger deposits, however, were never fully explored, and with gold prices soaring to record levels in recent years at least three West African governments are now engaged in efforts to revive the age old trade, as this article reports in some detail.

Ghana, Sierra Leone and Upper Volta are each taking steps to cash in on today's lively market for gold.

In the Sierra Leone fold now being mined were actually first discovered by British geologists during the colonial period, in the 1930s, when gold brought only 35 per ounce. Records of this prospecting gathered dust for many years in the national archives. Last year, however, at a tip from an industry source, geologists at the Bauxite mining Freetown and uncovered the British data after days of rummaging.

Since conducting a first preliminary tests on ancient Bauxite and panner Adolf Ludin, who together run a small venture called Eurogen, announced a bonanza find. The scene of the gold find, located at Bauxhallah, in the southern part of the country, are reportedly larger than normal and may be accessible for open pit mining, which would lower potential costs.

Eurogen and its partner, Diamond Exploration, have purchased a 12 month exploration license and have spent $3 million on preparatory work. They estimate total reserves at 20 million tons of ore averaging .2 ounces of gold per ton, a reasonably profitable grade of ore.

The start up cost of the mine has been projected at between $10 and $40 million, according to Eurogen's Ludin. Naturally we will need a very good agreement with the Sierra Leone government before we put that sort of money in", he adds.

All the Sierra government spoke on the 50-50 split that has characterized most partnerships in other mining ventures, gold ...ment could net Sierra Leone 1,500 ...

Liberia and Upper Volta (Ghana long dubbed the 'Gold Coast' from the early days of contact with Portuguese and other European traders, boasts the more ambitious and documented plans to date.

...th a high commercial business seminar last month in Accra, Ghanaian officials told an invited audience from around the world that the country still has sufficient gold reserves to rank among the top five producers. Government leaders further pledged that they were prepared to take all necessary steps to get gold business booming again, including the institution of ...ive financial and special incentives.

The target is an annual output of ... between 2 and 2.5 million ounces, a level roughly six times greater than current production. Ghana's gold industry hit a peak of nearly 1 million ounces in 1909-80, but it slipped into a decline for the next two decades, dropping to 300,000 ounces in 1978, which put it at the bottom of producers.

Mission officials will be told soon the world's top investor, with annual production in the neighborhood of 30 million ounces per year, followed by Canada (11.1 million) and the United States (11.1 million).

...ut realistic Ghana's hopes for an output of 2.5 million ounces could earn the country hundreds of millions of dollars annually for the year 2000 and create as many as ...

...The development program calls for the opening of some 16 new mines (three are now in production) at a cost of $2 billion over the next two decades. According to Ghanaian officials, however, only 11.3 billion will be needed as an actual investment for the 1980s, because mining profits would cover the balance.

Some stunning figures have been proposed by the United Nations Development Program, which estimates that Ghana could double its production with an injection of 500 million in new capital.

The potential investors who attended the Ghana seminar, including the British-based Lonrho and S.G. Warburg and Company, and West Germany's Krupp, are now weighing the pros and cons of Ghana's bid. One major attraction , presumably, is the high quality of Ghanaian ore. In today's market mines can operate profitably with recovery rates of .75 ounces per metric ton of ore. At Ghana's Ashanti mine, however, the grading values are close to 5 ounces per ton, and on the average Ghana's mines are twice as rich as South Africa's in the region.

There are angled risks as well, of course. For one thing, experts in London are especially skeptical of Accra's claims regarding production capacity. Some geologists, according to the Africa Economic Digest, say a target of even 2 million ounces a year would be too high. In addition, the scale of investment depends on the price that gold will fetch on the world market, and some analysts forecast a continued price fall.

CRACKDOWN ON THE BLACK PRESS

JOHANNESBURG and The Star's Commission of Inquiry established last year to look into the performance of the news media, has been looking hopeless here and government officials called to testify have stood aside without allegations against the English language press.

The Weekly, from the Department of Foreign Affairs, accused certain newspapers of being "undesirable elements in the psychological onslaught against the country and consequently it is the responsibility [illegible] of South Africa.

A Department of Defence psychologist blamed the political reporting by some newspapers of the "total disruption" [illegible] on "subversive elements" in an attempt to discredit the statistics that have been put out the African National Congress.

Another of those testimonies declared a series of "anti" articles on the banned African National Congress published recently in the Johannesburg newspaper, The Star.

Star, because the articles blamed the "suppression" of dissent on the inhabitants of white South Africans.

Some of the most serious charges were made by the head of the security police, Brigadier Hendrik Coetzee.

According to Coetzee, reports such as those concerning the banning of black student organizations in 1977, [illegible] an support for subversive organizations.

He also alleged that certain reports concerning the South African leader Steve Biko were sent to police contacts overseas [illegible] of a campaign to discredit developments in the internal security dun.

Time and again, articles and persons said the Steve Biko inquest, that newspapers were responsible for the unhealthy state of race relations in South Africa.

Repeated calls have been made to censorship controls, [illegible] the organisation of journalists, regulations controlling the licensing of reporters, and disciplinary action against editors who [illegible] the bounds of [illegible] and regulations.

A common thread running through most of the submissions has been an emphasis of the "total onslaught" facing the country and the need for clampdowns to back the government in the "total onslaught" to counter the opponents offensive.

DEVELOPMENT, FRENCH STYLE

The French weekly magazine Jeune Afrique Economie has reported that the government is studying the creation of a new intervention force for Africa. Without sanctioning the creation of the formation, the paper says the new unit will be called the [illegible] Intervention Brigade.

The report came just two days after President Giscard d'Estaing appeared on national television to discuss French foreign policy. D'Estaing attempt that he would "defend the interests of France", without resorting to colonialism.

FIVE BIRDS FOR 30,000 INSECTS

Ninety years ago English explorers arrived the Nine Islands from what is now in Zimbabwe and took them to South Africa. Last week - having been exchanged with the government of South Africa for one of the world's finest ostrich collections - the treasures were unveiled in Salisbury by Zimbabwe officials. The Zimbabwe birds became symbols of the national struggle against white rule and appear on the title [illegible] flag as well as on the more private [illegible] items like T-shirts and ashtrays.

They will be eventually be transferred to a specialised museum at the site of the Zimbabwe ruins classical stone structures built by African [illegible] northern Zimbabwe as early as the 12th century. Under white rule, archaeologists were taught that the artifacts were too sophisticated to have been built by blacks and must have been left by some lost European or Asian culture.

Mugabe orders army to crush rebel riots

BULAWAYO, Zimbabwe, Feb. 12 (AP) - Prime Minister Robert Mugabe today ordered his former foes, the white-led regular army and air force, to smash dissidents former guerrillas loyal to his opposition partner, Joshua Nkomo.

Military sources reported that the Government used helicopter gunships and mortars against the insurgents on the outskirts of Bulawayo, Zimbabwe's second largest city. Mr. Mugabe, who was in Salisbury, the capital, 256 miles to the northeast, said he was prepared to use an even higher degree of violence to rout the [illegible] former guerrillas loyal to him and [illegible] from a guerrilla force loyal to Mr. Nkomo.

TEN BLACK COMMANDMENTS

Principles for Survival

1. We MUST seek unity with our Creator, recognizing the reality of God, as we search for the truths which will set us free.

2. Brothers MUST commence being real men and stop exploiting the weaknesses of Black women by disrespecting and misusing the healers and nourishers of our future.

3. Sisters MUST dress and have a decorum that commands respect, then demand that Black men cease abusing you for present, short-term gratification at the expense of future, long-range objectives.

4. We MUST strive for academic excellence, not for the purpose of selfish material gain, but to prepare ourselves for a lifetime of productive service for the elevation and advancement of our people.

5. We MUST by our everyday examples challenge our friends, relatives, and associates to cultivate a wholesome race pride which will generate warmth, love, and a spirit of community among us as a people.

6. Our bodies MUST be treated as temples of the Holy, therefore we must safeguard our health by consuming good, life-giving foods and drink and not consume harmful, death-dealing drugs and alcoholic beverages.

7. We MUST stop imitating the degenerate actions of white people, whose world order is diametrically opposed to the legitimate aspirations of Black and other oppressed peoples.

8. We MUST stop lying and gossiping on each other, as well as check our roguish activities, for these actions stunt the growth and development of both perpetrator and victim, thus undermining the faith and trust so desperately needed among us.

9. We MUST actively engage in destroying the artificial barriers of political, sectional, fraternal and religious differences which so foolishly divide and fragment our race.

10. We MUST, today, work as hard to integrate and be non-violent with ourselves as we were, yesterday, to integrate and be non-violent with others.

NOTE: The Ten BLACK Commandments were written by Geoffrey Patterson, a graduate student of theology at Howard University. These "principles for survival" are based on the perspective of Minister Farrakhan's five-national address on the survival of the Black community.

Searching for rock's ultimate film

By ROB HUFFMAN

In considering the question "will the ultimate rock 'n' roll film ever be made?", I am stymied by my inability to define what elements this film should entail. Six definitive words on the subject exists – Jenkinson and Warner's Celluloid Rock being authoritative, but hopelessly out of date.

Should the ultimate rock film be an audio-visual record of an historic event, such as Woodstock (1970), Gimme Shelter (1970), or The Last Waltz (1978), or should it be a mixture of fiction and music such as Alice's Restaurant (1969), the early Beatles films, or most of Elvis Presley's 33 films? To confuse the issue further, some films don't entertain much musically, but portray so well the atmosphere that permeate rock that they, too, are classics. Rebel Without A Cause (1955), The Wanderers (1980), and Elvis Presley (1979) all have this latter quality.

Other rock films are terrible. Jet Pilot's Lonely Hearts Club Band (1978) was universally panned, though I still maintain that Earth, Wind and Fire, Aerosmith, Billy Preston, and even Frampton and The Bee Gees when they play "Polythene Pam" are colorful, enjoyable moments that were at least parts of this otherwise dippy concert. Generally, the main "background" a film is, the less true rock is portrayed. Just look at Blackboard Jungle or Don't Look Back (1965).

The 50's, predictably, have made excellent contributions to the genre with Tommy (1975), The Kids Are Alright (1979), and Quadrophenia (1979), and Led Zeppelin, surprisingly produced the very creative The Song Remains The Same (1976).

The most annoying thing about rock films is that most of them are already quite outmoded by. Some, like subculture The Harder They Come (1973) always seem to be around, but most, like Mod Dogs and Englishmen (1971), The Concert for Bangladesh (1972) and Frank Zappa's trio of forays into the medium are no longer (or never were) widely distributed.

Speaking of annoying, the most memorable in rock celluloid clearly remains Fillmore (1972). Two moments into David LaFlamme's haunting violin solo during "It's A Beautiful Day's "White Bird," the film abruptly cuts to the mounting surrealism of Bill Graham supernatural cartoon of The Fillmore playing catch with his equally frail earthly body.

Continuity, the bane/torment in rock film history is a tie between Jimi Hendrix acting in between Robert Young and Dirk Carroll in Jimi Hendrix (1973), and watching Paul McCartney and George Harrison arguing in Let It Be (1970). The argument culminates with George heatedly telling his foil: "I won't play anything if you don't want."

What follows are mainly reviewers of eight features rock films that I have loved and hated in my search for the ultimate. Artistically they range from dismal to delightful, but all have value to the true rock connoisseur. Keep your eyes and ears open, as screening of these movies (pictures are rare).

THE T.A.M.I. SHOW (1965)

Truly thrilling – various music fans, it is exceptional to have this many ... (illegible) performances by this many great entertainers on one piece of celluloid. The many great entertainers on one piece of celluloid. The musical includes Leslie Gore singing "It's My Party," Smokey Robinson and the Miracles with "I've Really Got A Hold On Me," Jan[illegible] and the Paramours' beautiful "Don't Let the Sun Catch You Crying," and of course the young Rolling Stones' haunting "Time is on My Side." The prelude stand for Jam Awards Music tournament, it's black and white and the sound isn't very good, but where else can one see the Barbarians, Billy J. Kramer and the Dakotas, The Supremes, Jan and Dean, and Chuck Berry playing in front of a real teenage audience?

HOW I WON THE WAR (1968)

John Lennon has a supporting role as Gripweed, a British private in World War II, and though this superb film has no rock music in it, I feel that it qualifies as a rock 'n' roll film nonetheless. The juxtaposition of fantasy, humor, and anger, amid constant (illegible) – as deftly carried out by director Dick Lester (who also directed Help! and A Hard Day's Night), gives How I Won The War a rock 'n' roll perspective.

The cinematography is innovative and provocative, and the screenplay features the gobbledy of hilarious slapstick and vigorous anti-war sentiment. The funniest moment in the film comes when it is discovered that Gripweed (Lennon) has emptied all the water from their tank, to make it easier to transport through the desert, while the most prophetic moment happens near the end. Gripweed, shot in the stomach and clutching that part of his body is agony, looks straight at the camera and says, "I to know this would happen, didn't you?"

DON'T LOOK BACK (1965)

Bob Dylan has released this essential film from circulation, making an already rare film even more obscure. Made entirely by D.A. Pennebaker, who was also responsible for the notable Monterey Pop (1969), Don't Look Back is a unique document that succeeds, despite the limitations of being in black and white and having been shot entirely with one rather small camera.

The simplicity of the movie, though, is a salute for portraying the unstructured dimensions of pre-electric Dylan. Pennebaker was invited to join Dylan (who at the time worked as a one-man band, travelling with his manager and only an occasional sympathetic ear) on his tour of England in 1965. The filmmaker now admits that his biggest worry while shooting this footage was that Dylan would suddenly cut the project, leaving Pennebaker with unusable reels of film and no return ticket to America. Seeing the turbulent Dylanogue in these very candid backstage moments, it's easy to see the cause of his anxieties.

Among the priceless scenes that the public was never to be allowed to see again are Dylan confusing Donovan at a party, insulting college journalists, and hysterically giving away "Cost Bob Dylan Instructions" to people that he wishes to be rid of. Joan Baez is also seen off-stage composing new material.

RAINBOW BRIDGE (1971)

Something incredible happens in the middle of the re-cent film. Bearing no relation to the plot of director Jacobs (if there's one), there is an absolutely vintage Jimi Hendrix concert captured on an idyllic hillside in Hawaii. It lasts for about half an hour, and then the audience is free to go back to sleep or leave the theater.

PINK FLOYD (1972)

Pretentious, repetitive, and indulgent, it was clearly a waste of money and effort to film the look at cranial-overloaded musicians "goofbrowsing" in the ruined colosseum architecture and eating lunch at a nearby cafeteria.

BLANK GENERATION (1976)

Mixed films of Blondie, The New York Dolls, Patti Smith, The Talking Heads, The Ramones, The Shirts, et al, comprise the visual portion of Blank Generation, while recordings of their later, well-known works provide the audio. It is fascinating to see these now-famous bands in their younger days, but it's most annoying to have a soundtrack that doesn't correspond with the screen images. The historic value is great, but the artistic value is quite minimal.

THE GREAT ROCK 'N' ROLL SWINDLE (1980)

About halfway through this recent British saga, the actor portraying The Sex Pistol's manager remarks: "I suddenly realized that I had not only four musicians who couldn't play, four lead singers who couldn't act, as well." This statement sums up the tenor (look it) Rock Juvenile better than anything I could say.

THE WIZARD OF WAUKESHA (1980)

Les Paul is a genius, and the great uncle of rock 'n' roll. Every pre-literature guitar-rock short of total-declaration feedback was originated by this musician, and it is more time he invented multi-track recording and the solid-body electric guitar.

Essentially a biography of this amazing man, The Wizard of Waukesha examines his early recording days with Bing Crosby, the television series he starred in with his late wife Mary Ford, and a few of his unprecedented inventions.

But the highlight of this special visit is seeing Les in concert today. Fast, funky, and original, he is also an expert at using new delay hi-tech audio-video effects designed running for guitarists.

THE FUTURE

What the future will bring I can't tell you. I can tell you that the first two Beatles films, A Hard Day's Night (1964) and Help! (1965), are being taken out of circulation by producer Walter Shenson, who now owns exclusive rights to both films, and will be re-released at the rate of one every two years. If you remember their zany take on Rock 'n' Roll High School (1979), which our music's be a Ramones for the '80's. Lastly, I can tell you that my secret hope is that someday The Kinks will envision and create The Ultimate Rock 'n' Roll Film (1987). It was Ray Davies of the Kinks, after all, who reminded us that "subject tattoo never lie/ way past, and civilized heroes never really die."

In 1955, Blackboard Jungle was the first major film to use rock 'n' roll music, featuring "Rock Around The Clock" (the song) by the late Bill Haley and the Comets. The next year, encouraged by the success of this film, Haley and the Comets made Rock Around The Clock (the movie), a cautious, low-budget picture that nonetheless had kids ripping seats out of theaters. Even the Queen of England asked to view it.

Jimi Hendrix, with Mitch Mitchell and Billy Cox are all that save Rainbow Bridge, a psychedelic waste of celluloid.

Walter Chesnut: trumpeter, teacher

By MICHAEL KENDRICK

A walk through the UMass Music Department is an adventure in sound. Practicing, lessons, and jamming can be heard late into the night, the many types of music melding into a disjunct whole which assaults eardrums in a pattern that changes as one traverses the corridor. Deep within this cavern of cacophony is the office of Professor Walter Chesnut, trumpet teacher and soloist, conductor, educator, and above all, one of the most dedicated musicians in the Pioneer Valley.

Professor Chesnut first came to the University in 1947, and started working with a program of only five trumpet majors. He quickly went to work expanding the scope of the program, and developed countless members of the marching band to take private lessons.

His students today are an excellent group of musicians, and many of them have come specifically to study with the much respected "Wally Bear" on some badly needed advice. Says graduate student Mark Baggett, "Professor Chesnut has been single handedly responsible for the expansion of the University Trumpet Studio into one of the finest that I have seen in the country."

What makes Mr. Chesnut such a fine teacher is his ability and experience as a solo performer. He is considered one of the foremost trumpet soloists in New England, and has a reputation throughout the United States, Europe, and wherever else he has done concert tours. A few years ago, he had the opportunity to perform the Haydn Trumpet Concerto with the Boston Pops Orchestra, conducted by the legendary Arthur Fiedler.

Last year, with professor/organist Ernest Mac Chesnut released the record Music For Trumpet and Organ on the MMA label, and received well favorable critical support. Now he is working on his forthcoming release of music for trumpet and flugelhorn, an instrument more familiar to Duke Ellington fans that to the perpetrators of the concert music idiom. A tour of Virginia and the Midwest, and another one of Germany, are also in the making for the very near future.

Though most people would be happy just to be a great soloist and teacher, Professor Chesnut has also become recognized as a top conductor of student and college ensembles. He has an almost constant demand on his time to appear as guest conductor with many different bands in New England, and is an annual favorite with directors, all state, and New England Brass festivals. Mr. Chesnut is also the conductor for the Urban Brass Choir, an organization that he formed in 1968, and only recently stepped down as conductor of the Wind Ensemble.

Now, as another semester rolls around, Professor Chesnut is off on a whirlwind spring tour during the one weekend syllabus. He is also spending some time on different Universities across the country, checking different teaching techniques, and trying to find ideas to put on the UMass music program. But he will be back, and with him, the ever-growing standard of excellence that produced Chesnut the Independent at the University.

Dancers return from tour

By PAUL EVANS

The University Dancers, a performing ensemble made up of advanced level students from the dance department here at UMass, completed a very successful tour of various Massachusetts high schools during the January intersession.

The artistic director for the group, Richard Jones, spoke highly of the experience. "We had that this is a great opportunity for the dancers. Every situation they encountered on this trip was exactly what they may hope to find out there in the real world with a professional dance company", he stated, adding that each of the schools which they visited had responded very positively to the performers and that for several this was a return engagement because of especially warm responses they had given the dancers in past years there.

The dancers themselves were all enthusiastic about the level of interest that had been shown in them at the schools and spoke highly of what they were able to accomplish on the tour.

Performing before students in the Springfield township school system, for the very artistic community of Hull, at several schools located out on the Cape and for other schools spread throughout the state, the dancers spent two weeks dancing in anything from gymnasiums and cafeterias to fully equipped, thoroughly modern performing arts centers. "It is of course what we perform are almost nothing having to do with dance. We are helping to expand the audience awareness of our art", said Jones.

The tour, which is an annual undertaking for the dance department, was almost cancelled several times due to financial difficulties. Usually a fee is charged in order to cover the dancers' traveling expenses, but this year, with the passage of Proposition 2½, all but a very few of the schools that had been counted on to sponsor the tour were forced to withhold funding. Financial assistance was finally obtained through the Provost's office and completion of all the plans and arrangements for the tour was able to be made just before the University closed for the Christmas break.

The program prepared for the schools consisted for the most part of pieces already in the dancers' repertory from their concert held here at UMass in October. Additional works were choreographed in order to have a more well-rounded presentation of modern, ballet, and jazz dance. In addition to their performances, the dancers also taught master classes and gave lecture demonstrations to interested students in most of the schools visited.

FINE ARTS CENTER CONCERT HALL

Any which way, Clint can't

By TOM KEOUGH

One of the fondest memories of my youth was going to weekend Clint Eastwood and Charles Bronson matinees. Those films, usually with titles like "Dirty This" and "Deadly That" certainly guaranteed the viewer the opportunity of hearing the Italian hating knack, sense, control, and for a short time at least, thinking he could take on the world of the mafia and revenge-mongerers.

Unfortunately, things have now changed. Either I'm getting older or the films have gotten worse, for, instead of leaving the theatre viscerally cursing down off a cheap macho trip, the viewer now leaves the theatre with a mixed feeling inside. After all, he has just witnessed two hours of formulated nonsense that has been made by people with nothing but contempt for their audience. Every Which Way You Can is the kind of film.

Clint Eastwood, the star of the picture, will probably go down in history as the force behind some of the finest westerns ever made. His unrelenting presence in the original "Dirty Harry" film has never been matched by any actor before or since. His performances in "Escape From Alcatraz" should have at least secured an Academy Award nomination. He is the biggest box office attraction in the world today, and perhaps for all time; and for the past four or five years, most of his films seem to have been designed solely as a diversion for us here at Intervale.

The "Good ol' Boy" genre movies used cream little into when films like Every Which Way You Can first saw things like "The Blues was made for the common man" or "...we try to represent plain old down home values...blah, blah, blah." I don't mind these people laughing on their way to the bank, but I do resent their excuses and scorn. By publishing these little phrases, they are implying that the average American is nothing more than an idiot. Are we living in a nation of cretins? Is this a country populated only by mental defectives? Are we a generation of morons, dim wits, and mental defectives? Somebody out there is convinced most think so.

It's not that Clint keeps on turning out one bad movie after another (it's just that he keeps on turning out the same bad movie over and over again. In "The Gauntlet" we find Clint leading the same wrecked, off and on, romance love interest Sandra Locke through the Arizona desert, while at the same time trying to evade a battalion of psychopathic lawmen who want to shoot him.

Fortunately, Clint is in on all this gross through most of Escape From Alcatraz, so we don't get to see Sandra once more. Clint never considered that this is why the film was so good: character, they're back together again making up the picturesque Siskiyou landscape in "Bronco Billy," and just to keep up the tradition, they're still going through the motions in Every Which Way You Can.

Can what? Turn out the same god-error and over again and still call it entertainment? It's really appalling to see what passes for humor in these films. A grinning orangutang that makes obscene gestures and relieves himself in the back seat of police cars may be one the first time that we see it, but even the most sophisticated viewer laughs a get bored after the tenth repetition.

Burt Reynolds, as Clint's mate, gives an excellent one of two weeks acts, but after seeing it in every film since Harold and Maude" one begins to wonder whether or not it is an act or whether is itself is a cause for alarm. After returning to Southern Comfort as Clint's sometimes sidekick Orville, plus a gang of unsentimental bikers who, when they remember that they are still unable to lay their mother' curse on him, formally, the only fanatical character from the previous film, a promising young Irish country upbeat by Beverly D'Angelo who somehow has never to team up with one human, fails to return. Perhaps she was offered better parts in a small film.

The ghost of a plot which haunts this film (though it's many counter measures Clint's character Philo Beddoe, an unsolved auto mechanic who involves as a second fighter for the sake of side bets and his never ending crusade of outsmarting whatever Sandra stands in his way. This opinion is all very good and we sing exchanges every time and were made most out of such others; here just for the fun of it. But when the mob kidnaps Sandra in order to induce him into fighting their own fellow upstart with confidence by William Hurtz, then things have gotten out of hand.

In the mentality of this film, the death of a youngster and the sudden appearance of a group of black businessmen is supposed to come out as offensive, but when two men start tossing each other apart for the enjoyment of the crowd, then it's just some good old fashioned fun. Violence such as this is just another sick symptom of our society and hardly a fit subject for glorification in a major motion picture.

The plots of these two films are so shockingly alike that they make ERIC it seem like a conversation over coffee.

It wouldn't be completely fair to say that these films are totally without merit—for most of them feature some nice scenery, and a few choice characterizations from some of the supporting actors that Clint keeps in his stable over in his California based, Malpaso Production Company—a corporation created for the sole purpose of maintaining the Eastwood mystique.

Some of the more fashionable critics have given these films some good reviews since they really don't pretend to be much of anything and as a rule lack some of the more graphic violence that characterized most of his earlier films. Is it because they had their films genuinely amusing or is it because their professional egos won't let them put a film that will make millions of dollars? If this is the case, even the critics are guilty of promoting a dreary, sloppy, and lazy type of film that would probably be rejected by the Irish Television programmers.

I mean I can, I dunno you can do better than this.

Blood Beach: Stay Away!

By Andrew Gordon

Blood Beach, the newest shlock-shocker on the movie circuit, is so awesomely bad that it is hardly worth reviewing; but if the Collegian is to devote space to films like Ordinary People or Stir Crazy or Raging Bull, then it must give equal time to the garbage.

Blood Beach's director-screenwriter, Jerry Gross, has created a mish-mash of a film. Its thin plot appears to have been written around the ingenious, although somewhat silly, idea of having people sucked into the beach by a creature lurking under the sand. This idea, and the way the special effects team rigged it for the cameras, is the only good thing about the film. Every other aspect is lacking. Gross's misguided direction does little for the film. He doesn't understand framing and consistently shoots the backs of actors. His original screenplay is no better. The actors mumble inane dialogue throughout the two-hour too-long flick. It is my own personal theory that this dialogue was all improvised. Gross probably doesn't know how to write dialogue; he certainly doesn't know how to draw characters or keep an interesting idea going for more than ten minutes.

But Blood Beach's failures don't end with Jerry Gross. Perhaps to keep a balance with Gross, editor Jose Johnson and cinematographer Jim Shaw were hired. Each is probably the worst in his field. Johnson keeps the film running at a painfully slow pace and then leaps into a totally abrupt climax. Shaw, son of the film's producer, Run Run Shaw, has, for some strange reason, shot the whole movie through a diffusion lens, which explains the bright haloes of light that surround lamps, windows and candles. The soft focus also makes the film itself look about as grainy as the beach where most of the action takes place.

It would be nice if I could say that the acting saved the movie, but John Saxon, Burt Young and David Huffman, all good actors, look tired and embarassed by the whole production. Attractive blonde Linda Barrett, however, makes a nice debut as a model but is swallowed up as soon as her character is established.

On the whole, Blood Beach has nothing to offer, but this did not stop publicity boss Ken Dram from making this ridiculous piece of exploitation a success. It is a sad reflection of the film industry as it stands today; that such a film could get financed and made; and that it would find an audience.

Resnais' great uncle

Mon Oncle d'Amerique
Pleasant St. Theater thru March 10

By SUSAN RING

Alain Resnais' Mon Oncle d'Amerique (My Uncle of America) is a moving study of human behavior. Focussing on our tendency to escape from situations with which we can't cope, Resnais expertly intertwines a running narrative by Prof. Henry Laborit (French Behaviorist) with a gripping portrayal of the lives of three characters from varied walks of life.

Laborit tells us about our behavior; Roger Pierre, Gerard Depardieu and Nicole Garcia display it all too accurately.

Pierre plays a hopelessly bourgeois middle-aged politician. He's a social climber plagued with kidney stones which render him quite unsociable. He is truly a rat.

Depardieu gives a sensitive performance of a self-made man with stomach ulcers. Raised on a farm as a Catholic, his character is, at the age of 40, an unimaginative yet very decent textile executive. He can no longer keep up with the modern business world and for lack of a better idea attempts suicide.

Garcia delights as a spirited young woman brought up in Paris as a communist. Her character at once offers us hope and absolute desolation. After a brief but brilliant career as an actress and an affair with Pierre the schmuck, she is hired by a man who is the epitome of all vile things that may be said about capitalism. She becomes a superior (in the business sense only) of Depardieu's. She's a bright beautiful and caring woman, and yet she seems to sell out and sleep with callous boars.

Garcia's character attempts to release her anger and frustration rather than turning it inward as the two males do. As a woman she's allowed to cry. She also smashes things and lashes out at Pierre. She at least attempts to take control of her life. Perhaps she is therefore the saddest character; she shows the most promise but is unable to be true to herself.

The significance of the film's title is that an uncle in America symbolizes a panacea, an escape from ennui. He is rich and has the wisdom to solve all problems if only he existed. As Garcia's employee/lover says "America doesn't exist. I know, I've lived there." There is no uncle, there is no escape. Resnais' film, in French with subtitles, is a masterpiece to be seen at least twice by psychology and foreign film buffs alike.

University dance students perform in the Student Dance Concert last weekend.

Spring event set for mid-May

By NANCY ANDERSON
Collegian Staff

After 10 months of negotiations, a decision has been set for a "Community Day" in mid-May following weekend negotiations between administrators and students, student co-President Rich Moran said last night.

Since 1906 one of the biggest highlights during the spring at the University of Massachusetts has been the annual spring concert. The concert has become a controversial event in recent years following problems with noise, drug and liquor abuse. Following last year's Spring Concert, negotiations began to revise the annual spring event.

Although plans for the event are still tentative Moran, said he is sure the event will not be "overly musical."

Several budget items for the day have been proposed, but nothing will be finalized until they can line up an entertainment package, Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Dennis Hudson said.

Frana Gerenda, Talent Coordinator for the Union Program Council who Moran said knows of the entertainment possibilities lined up, was not available for comment last night.

Moran will be speaking about the negotiations at the Student Senate meeting tonight.

"The day is going to be based on some theme to enhance the event, and we are looking into ideas such as having a distinguished student speak to bring some dignity to the program," he said.

"Community Day 1981" will be held in Alumni Stadium, security will be increased and protective barriers will be set up along the walls for safety, Moran said.

Although this year the event will encompass more than just a concert, the number of people allowed to enjoy the show is going to be decreased to 25,000, 5,000 less than last year's attendance.

"We will still be able to raise enough revenue to put on the same caliber show as in the past, but only five-college students, faculty, administrators, staff, and alumni will be invited to come. No guests will be allowed," said Moran.

Moran also said that the talent for this year's show will be of a more "mellow" tone than in the past. "It will be of the more high level quality, but not heavy rock and roll," he said.

Students can be happy, proud, and anticipate a great day for a number of reasons, Moran said. "There can never be a tradition that Hines gravely supports student's safety will be enhanced, and because of this year's planning, we will not run the risk of jeopardizing the reputation of this university again," he said.

Talks concerning on the location of the show, safety and health problems, the type of entertainment, a limit to the number of people allowed to attend, and security precautions have been the subject of the negotiations going on between the administration, Union Program Council officials, and Moran.

Dennis Hudson, vice-chancellor for student affairs, Frana Gerenda, talent coordinator for UPC, and Moran, on behalf of the SGA, were able to reach their separate, mutual objectives and finally arrive upon a "basic formula" for the day, Moran said.

"We've had a lot of concerns due to the problems faced during the concert the past couple of years, and everybody had some different of opinion on how they should be worked out. That took some time, but we've honestly got a plan to work on now," Hudson said.

Regents screen 50 for Chancellor's post

By SAMUEL OSGOOD
Collegian Staff

The new Board of Regents search committee have screened the applicants for the Chancellor of the Massachusetts higher educational system in only two weeks.

There were fifty applicants for the job, which Ronald Kuntz Jr. a University of Massachusetts at Amherst student and search committee member said is unusually small number for this type of position.

The new Chancellor will act as the representative to the state legislature for the system, Kuntz said. Also, the new Chancellor will direct the day to day policies for the campuses which the Board of Regents will set, he said.

Factors contributing to the small amount of applicants may include the uncertainty surrounding the salary, the speed in which the legislature passed the reorganizational packet last June and the political influence of a strong private sector in Massachusetts, Kuntz said.

The current salary level for the new position is $67,000, but the Regents, claiming comparable states pay higher for similar positions is asking permission to set the salary themselves.

The final applicants are:
Albert H. Bowker, former United States Assistant Secretary of Education;
Daniel L. Fisher, President of the Council for the Advancement and Support of Education;
Clayton L. Scroggins, Pennsylvania Commissioner of higher education;
Lawrence Cremin, Professor of philosophy, University of Colorado;
Joseph S. Murphy, President of Bennington College, Vermont;
Robert C. Quinn, Dean of Pennsylvania State University campuses and Thomas Ehrlich, a Visiting Scholar from the Brookings Institute in Washington D.C.

The Board of Regents is expected to submit their recommendation to Governor Edward J. King on March 2 or 3, Kuntz said.

Students fight building of new candy counter

By DEBBIE SPARKS
Collegian Staff

Organized student protests are mounting against the $41,000, newly renovated mini-store in the Student Union lobby as it nears completion.

The Student Coalition for Educational Research and Advocacy, (SCERA) has set up a table across from the renovation worksight and are collecting signatures for a petition. They are making the following demands: that the Student Union Mini-Store be made accessible to handicapped people; that the mini-store be student constructed and operated; that all revenue received be controlled by students; that all renovations over $5,000 within the Campus Center/Student Union complex be decided upon and receive final approval from both the Graduate and Undergraduate Student Senates.

SCERA's dissatisfaction stems from the fact that the Board of Governors never took a vote to approve renovating the newly created into the mini-store. SCERA member Arvid Muller described other projects which he felt were deserving of $41,000.

"Just look at the ceiling in Infirmary, it's falling apart," said Muller. "We have leaky roofs and electrical problems which are a fire hazard. This mini-store is an incredible drag in the face to students."

The mini-store, which was supposed to be completed today, went under contract on September 8, 1980. The plans as they were originally presented to the Board of Governors, a student group which oversees the Campus Center Complex, proposed the construction of a mini shop to be located across from the University Store. The project was rejected as it stood. The $41,000 total was reported as it stood. The $41,000 total was approved for the construction of the mini store.

Another protest group, composed of 40 UMass students, has filed a complaint in Hampshire County Superior Court, claiming that the Board of Trustees illegally appointed the renovations of the student union mini store and raised residence hall rents.

Campus Center Director William Harris described the goal of the new store as offering a much more atmosphere and being an overall improvement over the rarely crowded.

Alexandre, however, said she did agree that changes are needed for a better liason between administration and students.

SCERA Student Coordinator Arvid Muller holds a piece of tile which fell from the ceiling of his office in the Student Union to dramatize his belief that money spent for the new candy counter could have been better used.

Angela Bofill at Bowker Auditorium

Cash Box awarded the titles, #1 Top New Jazz Artist and #5 Top New Female Vocalist-Pop LP's to singer-songwriter, Angela Bofill. The 25 year old vocalist whose jazzy lyrics, commended by Latin verses, has been named Most Promising New Female Vocalist by Latin New York, according to an Arista Group press release.

Bofill has two albums, one entitled Angie and the other, Angel of the Night. According to the release, her debut album Angie, November 1978, has received favorable response and criticism. Pete Hamill a critic of the New York Daily News wrote, "the music is a city dream: lyrical and defiant...unearthly." This album reached #3 on Record World's jazz chart and #39 on Record World's pop chart. Record sales reached over a quarter of a million.

The tale behind this album explains the reason for her added success. According to the release, "flautist Dave Valentin, a longtime friend of Angie's, had just landed a recording contract with Producers Dave Grusin and Larry Rosen of their newly-formed label, GRP Records. Valentin asked if they were interested in a vocalist. Angela presented Grusin and Rosen with a funky demo cassette she had made at home. They were knocked out by the potential they heard. Angie gains from this, her album entitled Angie.

Bofills' melodies are pulsating. This quality makes her a compatible touring accomplice for other jazz artists. According to the release, Bofill recently engaged in a series of tours with jazz singer Al Jarreau.

The Washington Post declared her 'a remarkable young vocalist...with agility and delicacy.' The Chicago Tribune said, '...Bofill, like Billie Holiday, is a true vocal/focal point and because of her, it's a musically stimulating, highly visual act.'

By listening to Bofill's composition many of which she wrote, one learns that her potential has fully bloomed. Her ability is evident and this is notable by listening to her newest album, Angel of the Night. This combination of pop, jazz and R & B is not surprising when one acknowledges her musical background:

Born in the West Bronx and singing with her father by age 4, Bofill began a diverse musical career. The talented vocalist performed on bills with Dizzy Gillespie at Madison Square Garden, the Newport Jazz Festival-Cannonball Adderly and Down Beat Magazine.

While in high school at age 12, Bofill constructed a band who were according to the release, "jokingly called, The Puerto Rican Supremes."

After graduating New York's Hunter College High School, and attending the Manhattan School of Music where she was the only voice major experimenting with jazz, she sang with Richard Marrero and "The Group." Bofill's career prospered as she toured the "earthfirto" circuit of small Latin clubs and recorded a single, "My Friend," for this she was nominated Best Latin Female Vocalist by Latin New York Magazine.

Arista Records wrote that, "after leaving Merrero's band at age 21 to go solo, Angie composed a multi-media jazz suite, 'Under The Moon and Over The Sky,' which she performed in association with The Brooklyn Academy of Music. The suite was also featured on Bofill's debut album."

Her experience extends even further. Bofill arranged, composed and conducted songs with the Dance Theater of Harlem Chorus for whom she also sang lead solo.

Angela Bofill will perform at Bowker Auditorium Friday, February 20th at 8:00 p.m., it's a great time to listen to a very promising and gifted singer/songwriter. Tickets are available at the Ticket Office in the Student Union Building.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

Editorial

Escaping the merger

The proposed merger between the University of Massachusetts at Boston and Boston State College, which seems almost certain at this time, has raised some questions as to the relationship between the new, enlarged facility and the state's largest University here in Amherst.

As the two UMass campuses have grown and developed, there has been a parting of their goals and needs, and their dependency on each other has diminished.

Originally, the two campuses were designed to be components of the same University in two different settings, serving different needs. The Boston campus was intended to serve the lower income, older and non-traditional students, all of whom live in the Boston area and commute to school. The Amherst campus, however, was intended to serve as the flagship of the state's education system, serving the more traditional college students.

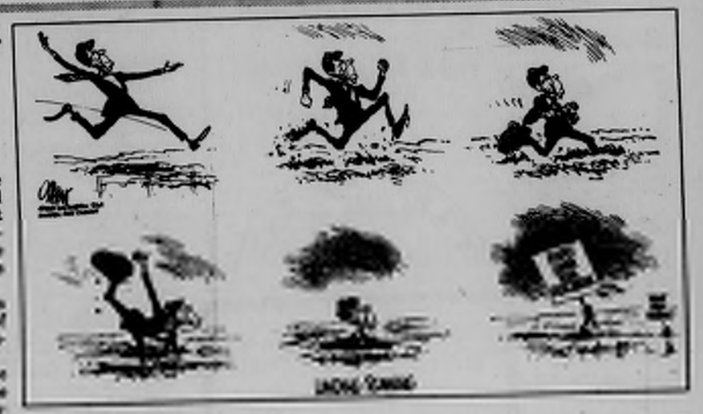
Through the years, as both campuses have grown, the distinction has become blurred. The two schools have both become fine universities in their own right, but the goals have become different and less distinct. Graduate and certain undergraduate programs, once the domain of UMass-Amherst, have been instituted in Boston. Instead of the schools serving each other, catering to different segments of the state population, the roles of each, in some instances, have overlapped and become confused.

As UMass-Boston and Boston State College prepare to join, the Boston facility seems to be taking on larger proportions. A single board of trustees now governs all three UMass campuses—Amherst, Boston and the Worcester Medical School—but if such a board, is to continue, it will be attempting to serve not only the three campuses, but will be governing two large diverse universities, whose only tie is the name "UMass."

Under the various merger plans, UMass-Boston/Boston State could become either the University of Massachusetts at Boston, retaining its current identity and taking on larger proportions, or could become the City University of Boston, taking on a whole new identity and purpose. Lawmakers are now weighing the benefits of both proposals and will soon make a decision.

UMass-Amherst and the Boston facility should be separated. With a central board of trustees and president's office governing three campuses, two of which are the state's largest facilities, something is bound to get lost in the shuffle, and it may well be, due to the geography, the Amherst campus.

For Amherst to retain its identity as the state's flagship campus and serve as the finest public institution in the Commonwealth, the University must be given its own identity, its own governance, along with its "satellite" Medical School in Worcester, to represent it with the Board of Regents and the legislature. One unit, working for one facility, would certainly be more effective than an organization working for two very different institutions.



Letters

Do we need the hullabaloo?

The oppression, exploitation and downright terrifying attitudes of the "Moral Majority" towards homosexuality shocked many listeners to gay people which were printed in Friday's edition of the Collegian. I must then add wholeheartedly biased they would make a difference. I too have to just cop with many anti-homosexual remarks and attitudes every day of my life.

When I turned the page and found myself in the Valentine section—and what should I find on page sixteen as an entirely heterosexual heterosexual person, complete with the usual being the "appropriate" number of ladies taken? I would be amazed at your courage if you likewise just stepped a few more inches. My point is not that you shouldn't show the ahead of your time enough to be sure), but rather I'd like everyone to consider the never ending barrage of heterosexual propaganda to which we are all subjected. Whether one is gay, bisexual, celibate, impotent, dogs, or casual, or just has a modicum of good taste, one must regard this situation heterosexual bilgewater.

And as I ask everyone to consider, do we really need all this heterosexual hullabaloo?

to halt construction of the Trident submarine base in Bangor, Washington) is now serving time for his efforts to stop the Trident submarine, a project of $18.6-billion. Following, are thoughts of him on what each can sometimes mean for some of us.

The following words were written at the end of time. (They time is now.) It was carried by no public media, only the consciousness of a person. The interview begins and ended in complete silence.

"What is Trident?"

"Trident is the end of the world."

"What do you mean?"

"Trident is a nuclear submarine being built now which will be able to destroy 408 cities or more at one time, each with a blast five times more powerful than the Hiroshima bomb. Trident is 9,000 Hiroshimas. One Trident submarine can destroy any country on earth. A fleet of 24 Trident submarines (there are planned now) end life on earth."

"I don't understand." (A submarine which equals 9,000 Hiroshimas? How can anyone understand that?)

Begin with a meditation: To understand Trident, say the word "Hiroshima." Reflect on its meaning for one second. Say and understand "Hiroshima" again. And again. And again. Let each time Hiroshima mean more to you. Let it enter your consciousness. Hiroshima. That's one Trident submarine. To understand the destructive power of the whole Trident fleet, it would take you seventeen hours, devoting one moment to each Hiroshima.

Your meditation is impossible. To understand Hiroshima alone would take a lifetime.

You do understand. Hiroshima was the end of our ability to imagine our destruction present, or to measure its consequences. Trident is the end of the world.

How does one live at the end of the world?

By beginning to love one. Now Trident, stop the world be an end-time, and build a new world.

"Resurrection," Goldie Hawn in "Private Benjamin," Mary Tyler Moore in "Ordinary People," Gena Rowlands in "Gloria" and Sissy Spacek in "Coal Miner's Daughter."

"The Empire Strikes Back," by far the biggest money-maker of the year, managed to collect only three minor nominations.

Oddly two of the nominees for best picture were photographed in black and white for purpose of mood—"Raging Bull" and "The Elephant Man."

"Fame," the story of young people attending a performing arts high school was released early in 1980 — and was something of a surprise with its good showing.

Matmen pin 2nd ranked Harvard

The UMass wrestling team, currently ranked third in the New England coaches' poll, brought second-ranked Harvard down a peg or two taking eight of ten matches and trouncing the Crimson 32-8 yesterday at a tri-meet in Cambridge. The University of Connecticut also fell to the Minutemen who bring their record to 12-2-3 with one meet remaining, a clash with first ranked Rhode Island Saturday afternoon at Boyden.

According to UMass coach Dave Amato, the win over Harvard should bring the team up in this week's poll.

Four Mass wrestlers went two-for-two yesterday starting with 118 pound Rich Schiarizzi who brought his record to 10-4-2 with the two wins.

126 pound Dana Rasmussen, (11-4) put on an impressive wrestling show yesterday slamming both opponents for pins.

Kevin Murphy also tallied a pin against the supposedly strong Harvard squad and defeated a UConn opponent 5-4. Murphy, who wrestles in teh 142 pound class, sports one of the most impressive records in New England, now 13-2, including three pins.

On Saturday, he will be wrestling URI's Bob Eon, defending New England champ. Against him, Murphy is 2-1, the one loss coming in the finals of last year's New Englands.

190 pound Bill McQuaide, who will be going up for his second consecutive New England championship and another trip to the Nationals this year, also went undefeated against the Crimson and Huskies yesterday afternoon.

Three time New England champ John Allen tied againt Harvard and easily defeated UConn.

The URI bout is the final meet of the season; a battle for first place among the New England colleges.

Swimmers take 13 events Mt. Holyoke left in wake

By FRANK NAGLE
Collegian Correspondent

The UMass women's swim team defeated Mount Holyoke College 87-53 last night in NOPE Gym by taking 13 of 15 events held.

It was an evening that was totally dominated by the UMass team. The Minutewomen won the 200 yard medley relay with a time of 2:00.53. Leslie Johnson took, the 500 yard freestyle in 5:31.72, the 100 yard butterfly in 1:03.69 and the 100 yard backstroke in 1:07.71. Nancee Shifflett won the 200 yard individual medley, a race involving the butterfly, freestyle, back and breast strokes, with a time of 2:21.69, and Maura Sweeney won the 100 yard freestyle in 59.51 and the 50 yard butterfly in 28.10.

In other events Betty Guerin won the 50 yard backstroke in 31.96, Jen Nicolai took the 50 yard freestyle in 25.92, Anne Whitlock won the 100 yard individual medley in 1:07.51 and Jen Black easily won the 200 yard freestyle with a time of 2:02.70. The last swimming event was the 100 yard breaststroke and Rosalie Nataupsky won it in 1:17.03.

UMass took a split decision in the diving competition winning the one meter diving optionals and losing the one meter required diving event. Gina Perrone put another strong performance winning the optionals with a score of 176.20 and coming in third in the required event.

The team finished up the season with a record of 3-9 but all but two members of the team qualified for the New England Division A Championship Tourney of Boston College. Thus far Perone, Nataupsky, and Black have all qualified for the AIAW Division II National Championships at North Michigan University. Four other members of the team also have a chance for qualifying for the Nationals; Shifflett, Johnson, Whitlock and Nicolai.

Head Coach Val Turtle thinks the team "will be very competitive," in the upcoming New England Tourney. Our record was 3-9 but we swam against some top schools in New England." That tourney begins on Feb. 27.

The men's swim team defeated Central Connecticut last night at Boyden pool and travel to Amherst College tomorrow for their final meet of the season. See Anna Roell's story in tomorrow's Collegian.

Hoopmen face BU rematch

By NANCY PARKS
Collegian Staff

With the home court advantage (and these men need every break they can get), the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team will be facing Boston University tonight after already being handed a 25 point loss against the Terriers three weeks ago in the Provident Savings Classic.

Rick Pitino, head coach of BU, plans on using the same defensive setup against the Minutemen that he used against them in the Provident Classic.

This is a big game for the Terriers, who need every win to keep and secure their position in the playoffs.

Right now, the BU men are fourth in theECAC stndings with a current season record of 11-10.

This would be a particularly sweet win for Pitino, who was a starter and a captain of two teams for the Minutemen under head coach Jack Leaman. Recruited by Ray Wilson Pitino brought those two teams to the National Invitational Tournament for Basketball and he is looking forward to playing his old alma mater on his former home court.

As to the advantage of the home team, Pitino thinks that a lot of it on the drawing of the crowd. Other than that he does not see the Minutemen having any other advantages.

One advantage the UMass men will not have over the Terriers will be first half shooting. In past games, poor shooting in the first half has taken the Hoopmen out of the game earlier than it should, and this is something the men will have to work hard at tonight to keep up with the Terriers.

Women's playoff hopes on the line

By KEVIN CULLEN
Collegian Staff

With their playoff chances hanging in the proverbial balance, the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team will try to make it two in a row when they take on the Owls of Southern Connecticut in a rare afternoon game today, at 3:30 at the Cage.

UMass (13-11) is coming off Monday night's 71-65 win over Central Connecticut, which snapped a four-game losing streak that had threatened the team's Eastern regional playoff chances. As it stands, Umass must win their remaining three games (Rhode Island next Wednesday, Boston University next Friday) to ensure a playoff bid.

In Southern Conn., UMass finds itself taking on a team in the midst of rebuilding a once-powerful program. The Owls, a perennial power in New England women's basketball, slipped a bit last year, but second-year head coach Tony Barone is blessed with a youthful team and a 12-9 record that gives every indication that Southern Conn. is or soon will be, back.

A reflection of Barone's youth is the fact that Southern lists no seniors on its roster and starts a lineup which has consisted, more often that not, of freshmen, a sophomore and a junior.

Two freshmen, 5-foot-11 center Cindy Beaudreau and 5-foot 8 forward Kym Osborne, lead the team in scoring, both averaging 11 points per game. Beaudreau, who is also the team's rebounder averaging nearly seven a game, will be trying to contain the inside game of UMass co-captains Julie Ready and Ginger Legare, which resurface the other night against Central Conn. after a four-game absence.

In the backcourt, the Owls will probably start the tandem of Shelly Jacobs and Tami Whately with Kathy Curley, a transfer from UConn, as a possible starter at the other forward position.

UMass enters today's game ranked third in New England, behind Providence and top-ranked BU in Div.1. How much stock can be placed in this is debatable, however, when one considers UMass has beaten Providence twice this year, while Dartmouth, which has beaten both BU and UMass, is ranked fourth.

Quasi-sports alternative athletics

Most sports on this campus are fairly easy to recognize. Football, basketball, a myriad of other sports and even intramurals are all highly visible when you take into consideration fan support and media coverage.

If you think about it a little bit, there are a lot of other activities which go on around UMass and most likely on plenty of other campuses across the country which could be classified "sports" if one took the definition less literally than usual.

Let's take a look at a few of these quasi-sports.

You're sitting by the window of your off-campus apartment on the lookout for the PVTA bus to take you into town. It's 19 degrees outside so you're not about to wait out there and freeze. Now the athletic aspects of the situation enter.

In order to make it to the bus stop from your apartment before the bus takes off without you, one must posess perfect timing and a well-seasoned sprinting ability. Your jacket should already be on and your books or pack should be within easy grabbing distance. Bus-sprinting requires some pre-event planning, you see. If you follow most of these basic rules and run like hell, you should have a reasonable degree of success and you'll be on the bus riding away instead of standing there with exhaust blowing in your face as the bus pulls away.

Stephen Freker

How about when you're in the dining commons with a full tray of food looking for a place to set it down. The sport involved here could be considered a cross between NASCAR stock car racing, a demolition derby and Larry Csonka bulling ahead for that last extra yard.

The carrier of the full tray must be skilled at spotting those open table spaces and must be capable of stopping short and accelerating with a minimum of drink spillage when a space is sighted and that last seat is to be snagged. (Note: The successful tray-driver must have innate aggressive instincts and an absence of foolish qualms against upsetting the heavily-laden trays of others in their haste to acquire a good seat. Who cares if you knock over their milk and it floods their plate of Meatloaf Italiano, you're not eating it.)

Another game that goes on constantly at UMass is a glorified form of hide and seek. Everyone knows how this one goes. It's 11:14 and you're walking down the steps of the Student Union and you have a class at 11:15 in Herter Hall. If you run, you might get there five minutes late and settle for a disgusted stare from your professor. (Of course this class is an eight person seminar and you look like a fool when you slither in late.)

You're all set for a last-minute bolt when out of the corner of your eye, you spot somebody you know walking in your general direction. What do you do? This person loves to yap and if you stop and give them a hurried "hello," he/she will talk your ear off about classes, intersession and other assorted banalities.

The first thing one does is to consider all avenues of escape. If you're in front of the Student Union for example, just turn about face, go back inside and hide behind a newspaper until the tongue-wagger walks by. You'll be a little later to your class, but at least you'll get there with two ears. Another favorite ploy is to stoop down just as the mouth" gets within sighting distance and make a quite phony and fastidious effort at tieing your shoes. One never worries about hurting someone's feelings in this game, the other person's probably trying to avoid you, too.

One of the most popular sports on campus probably retains its wide appeal because you don't have to be in any kind of shape, physically or mentally, to participate. All you need in this competition is a loud voice, a reasonably good imagination and a well-developed exaggerative quality to your descriptions of people and events.

Basically, this game is an offshoot of liar's poker. Participation is highest on Monday mornings. Busriders and checkcashers who must wait in line are common players. The object here is to determine who had the best weekend (or, who can convince someone foolish enough to listen that they had a wild one). The listener's participation in the contest consists of separating the b.s. from the truth, if any exists. For example, if the speaker tells you he/she drank 12 beers Saturday night, divide by three. Also, be sure to deduct at least two hours from the time the bold-faced prevaricator tells you he/she got home that night.

These have been just a few of the alternative athletics which go on at UMass, many on a daily basis. Now if we could only convince the Athletic Department to order some uniforms.....

Reagan unveils budget before Congress

By JAMES GERSTENZANG
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan pointed an "out of control" government onto an untested change of economic course yesterday, heralding a strategy which would slash federal spending by $41 billion next year and save a middleincome family of four nearly $1,500 in taxes by 1984.

Declaring "interest rates have reached absurd levels" while despair dominates the lives of 8 million unemployed Americans, Reagan rejected decades of New Deal federalism and pressed for a program of government austerity aimed at stimulating growth and jobs in the private sector.

He claimed his blueprint would have inflation, to 6.2 percent, within two years. And he vowed that the poor can "rest assured that the social safety net of programs they depend on" will not be cut.

Reagan, unveiling his program in a nationally broadcast address to a joint session of the House and Senate, said: "We can no longer procrastinate and hope things will get better. They will not. If we do not act forcefully, and now, the economy will get worse."

"Can we, who man the ship of state, deny it is out of control?" the president asked in his prepared remarks.

"The people are watching and waiting," he said. "They don't demand miracles, but they do expect us to act. Let us act together ... There is nothing wrong with America that we can't fix."

The federal spending cuts would be coupled with a $44-billion reduction in individual income taxes in fiscal 1982. Businesses would receive a $9.7-billion cut in their federal tax bite.

If enacted, the president's program, by shifting priorities and trimming growth, would set the nation on its sharpest shift since Franklin D. Roosevelt began a 50-year period of expansion at the height of the Great Depression.

Failure to follow his course, the president said, would mean that "inflation and a growing tax burden will put an

Hoffman blasts U.S., media

By ANDREA ATKINS
Collegian Staff

Former "Yippie" leader and fugitive Abbie Hoffman warned a full house at the University of Massachusetts Fine Arts Center last night not to be tricked by the media and by the government.

"Don't be fooled again," the 1960's activist told the crowd of mostly students. Hoffman lashed out at the press and the government by outlining a theory of how news gets to the American people.

The big corporations find out what the news is, Hoffman said, "they tell the CIA, the CIA tells the White House, they tell the press corps and the press corps tells the nation," he said.

Americans have to view the news analytically, he said.

"We have to be more critical, and watch for non-issues, distractions, and titillations," he said.

Hoffman, 43, a Worcester, Ma., native surrendered himself last September after living underground for six years. He jumped bail on cocaine charges in 1974. Hoffman will be sentenced on March 6 and faces a possible five-year jail term.

Hoffman, who was paid an honorarium of $3,500 by the UMass Distinguished Visitors Program, said the press is now portraying him as a media manipulator. He called this a "convenient lie" and holding out five fingers said, "I have CBS here, the New York Times here, "Peep-hole" magazine here, Walter Cronkite..."

Manipulators are those who own the media and who package news, Hoffman said. "You gotta be careful how yu read all those stories."

Hoffman said the press was not analytical enough before the start of the Vietnam War and sees some of the same problems today.

"I see the same kind of thing coming. I don't like seeing what's going on in Central America," he said. The media's story of El Salvador is not a true representation of the "indigenous force of peasant groups, students and workers fighting against the 14 families there who own everything," Hoffman said.

"Twenty-five thousand students marched in West Germany against U.S. involvement in El Salvador just ten days ago and no one even knows it here," Hoffman said at a press conference yesterday afternoon. Young people today are complacent, he said. They "are just too respectful."

"You got to get in on the ground floor," he told the UMass audience. "It's gonna be your younger brother or maybe your younger sister. Now's the time to organize teach-ins and to fight against that war," he said. Hoffman said it was important to understand that the movements of the 60's started with groups of people organizing on a small scale.

Hoffman cited the "legacy" of the 60's, which includes the end of legal segregation, the end of the Vietnam war, the start of a counter culture out of which grew the feminist and gay rights movements and the growth of students' rights.

"You're living off the fat of what was won in those struggles," Hoffman told the crowd.

Hoffman's one and one-half hour speech began with a string of comical remarks concerning today's social and political issues.

"I don't worry about Ronald Reagan," he said. "I believe that if he ever goes to push the button he won't be able to find it."

Spring event talent sought

By RON MILLER
Collegian Staff

The Union Program Council is now focusing its attention on securing talent for this year's Spring Community Day, now that most of the details of the event have been worked out with the administration.

Frank Gironda, talent coordinator for UPC, has been sorking on a talent package since November. He said the offers are in at this time and they expected confirms in the "near future."

He declined to mention who he has been talking to, but Gironda said the talent will appeal to a variety of musical interests.

Gironda said May 9 is a possible date for the event, but nothing is yet definite. He said picking the date depends on what talent is available, but he said they do not want to put it too close to finals, either.

Gironda said a plan for obtaining tickets would also be available soon. UMass students will have first crack at the tickets.

A total of 25,000 tickets will be available, Gironda said. The sale of extra tickets which will help subsidize the event, will be limited to UMass alumni on a first come, first serve basis.

He said UPC hopes to have one speaker at the event who will fit in with the theme of the day. The theme has also yet to be determined.

Gironda said he is optimistic, that the dealings with the administration have been positive, and he is confident that the students will be happy.

Gironda and the Student Government Association has been working with the administration since November.

"We came a long way in negotiations," Gironda said.

World and national news

No quick pay increases for legislators

BOSTON (AP) — The hotly argued legislative pay issue surfaced again at the Statehouse yesterday — but this time with the expectation that quick raises won't be forthcoming.

Mindful of the impact of Proposition 2½ and the resounding repeal of the last pay bill in the November election, the emphasis was on third party recommendations as the route to new increases.

The issue was aired at a hearing before the Legislature's Public Service Committee. The committee's chairman, Sen. Samuel Rotondi, D-Westchester, commented later, "the Legislature cannot withstand the symbolism of a pay raise at this time," and he said he would vote against any increase this session.

Sometimes folks dealing with the subject are before the committee, although most propose specific increases. Several supplement the November repealer by requiring roll-call votes on raises, varying between $4 thousand of the leadership and deferring any change to another term.

The last raise, including huge increases for the leadership, the governor and other constitutional officers, surfaced in the Senate on Halloween night in 1979 and was pushed through that chamber without a recorded vote.

The outcry led to its eventual repeal — by a resounding 8-1 margin — last November.

House Democratic Leader George Keverian of Everett presented the leadership's view at yesterday's hearing — calling for a new "private" commission to establish salary levels.

"The truth is that there is never a good time, but the need for fairness and equity, providing for reasonable compensation for public service, must override political considerations, or we do a serious disservice not only our colleagues but to their constituents and the democratic system of government," Keverian said. "This requires a kind of compensation for public service which will not discourage the participation of the average citizen without independent means."

Keverian said the Halloween pay bill was a result of "errors."

"Suffice it to say that most people, when polled about the legislative pay bill, were critical of the inordinately high increases for the legislative leadership and the procedure used to pass the measure."

A Massachusetts legislator's base pay now is about $20,000 with $2,400 in general expenses and a per diem allowance based on the distance his home is from the Statehouse.

Sen. Edward J. King was $45,000 in the speaker and other statewide officers are higher.

House Republican Leader William G. Robinson, a leader in the repeal drive, testified in favor of proposals that would limit leadership bonuses to 20 percent of the base and bar the legislature from collecting raises in the same year in which they are voted.

State ordered to fund abortions

BOSTON (AP) — The state Supreme Court ruled yesterday that Massachusetts cannot halt payments for "medically necessary" abortions for women on welfare.

The 6-1 class action decision, written by Justice Francis J. Quirico and released this day by law to serve as age 21, was greeted substantially by proabortion factions and strongly condemned by anti-abortionists.

The decision overturned a state law which limited reimbursement bursaries to women who faced life-threatening complications.

Gov. Edward J. King, who campaigned in 1978 on an anti-abortion platform, said his preliminary reaction was to "proceed to ground our constitution or the abortion issue is properly handled."

King said, "I'm opposed to the taxpayer paying for any abortions. We're already paying plenty, and personally I'm opposed to any kind of abortions."

In differing with the U.S. Supreme Court, the state bench held that the due process provision in the Massachusetts constitution prohibits abortion restrictions.

It is the second recent instance where the state court went the state one step on an emotional issue. It ruled last year that the Massachusetts capital punishment law was unconstitutional.

Left undecided was whether the state's Equal Rights Amendment — as suggested by plaintiffs — invalidated the abortion restriction added by the state Medicaid program after Hyde amendment was adopted by Congress.

"Because we agree that the challenged restriction impermissibly burdens a right guaranteed by our constitutional guarantee of due process, we do not reach the alternative grounds of invalidity asserted by the plaintiffs," the majority said.

Chief Justice Edward F. Hennessey, who concluded the state law was constitutional, volunteered in his dissent that the issue did not involve a "gender-based classification" under the ERA.

This was the latest in the almost endless litigation that stemmed from the U.S. Supreme court's ruling in 1973 that a woman had a constitutional right to abortion.

The latest Massachusetts challenge was filed last July by three unidentified women on welfare seeking abortions and Dr. Philip Stubblefield, a doctor at a Boston hospital. The case after the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the Hyde amendment and said that states must not subsidize abortions except when a mother's life was threatened.

Thomas R. Kiley, first assistant attorney general who argued the case, said Saturday he no further appeal of the state court ruling. He said it means that funding for "medically necessary" abortions cannot be halted, so long as the state has a health program.

Nancy Gertner, attorney for the Civil Liberties Union of Massachusetts, said, "As it stands now, and for the foreseeable future, there will be no restrictions on Medicaid funded abortions."

Former President Richard M. Nixon prepares to sign an autograph during a reception in Columbus, Ohio last night.

Finnegan seeks auditor job

BOSTON (AP) — Describing Proposition 2½ as a "reprieve" compared to other local problems the state has faced, House Ways and Means Chairman John J. Finnegan announced yesterday that he wants to leave his key legislative job and become state auditor.

The Boston Democrat held a news conference to announce his campaign for the vacancy shortly before opening hearings on Gov. Edward J. King's proposed $6.4 billion budget for the next fiscal year.

The budget — the most important bill in any year — has added significance this year for cities and towns which claim disaster lies ahead under the local tax-raising Proposition 2½ law, approved by voters in November.

The communities are pushing for increased local aid, and the job of seeking that assistance falls principally to the chairmen of Ways and Means in the House and Senate.

Auditor Thaddeus Buczko left the statewide elective post for a probate judgeship Feb. 15. It is up to the Legislature to choose a temporary successor, and the House and Senate will hold the elections next Monday.

The Legislature's choice, if he wishes to continue in the job, will have to face the public in the 1982 fall elections.

Finnegan, 44, said his "real impetus" in seeking the change is that "we are in a time of diminishing governmental resources. As auditor, your responsibility is to make government as efficient as possible."

He has been a member of the House for 16 years and Ways and Means chairman for six.

Finnegan said he has no qualms about switching jobs while the budget — and its ramifications for the financially pressed cities — are before the committee.

"This seat has always been a hot seat," he said. "Prop 2½ is a reprieve compared to what we went through here in 1980."

State senator to switch parties

BOSTON — The only black Massachusetts state senator, a Democrat who has been on the outs with the Democratic leadership, makes the switch to the Republican Party today.

Sen. Bill Owens, 49-Boston, quit his house-paying job as chairman of the Legislature's Veterans' Laws Committee last month, saying he didn't have influence with the leadership and Democratic Gov. Edward J. King.

Subsequently, Senate President William M. Bulger, D-Boston, removed Owens from the Ways and Means Committee at the request of its chairman, Sen. Chester G. Atkins, D-Concord.

Atkins said he made the request because sessions from Owens suggested "mental anguish," and he claimed Owens never attended the committee's meetings.

Tuesday, the Republican State Committee announced a news conference would be held by Owens and GOP officials this afternoon. A spokesman confirmed that Owens would switch party registration at that time, being signed statements by GOP by Boston election commissioners.

Owens had hinted on the change in several occasions, and he attended one of the previous Republican events held annually in Massachusetts, the annual Lincoln Day dinner.

Students demand reforms

WARSAW, Poland — Rebellious Polish students occupied university buildings in at least five Polish cities yesterday in back demands for education reforms and Lodz students won government agreement to form an independent student association.

Despite agreement to end a 48-day strike of Lodz, students took over classrooms in Warsaw, Torun, Krakow, Bialsk and Szczecin, according to student and government sources.

The outbreak of student strikes — over issues ranging from mandatory courses in Russian to more money for books — caused new problems for the government of Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski, who took office as premier a week ago with a pledge for 90 days without strikes.

Official Soviet media, meanwhile, printed new attacks on Polish strikers and accused those of directly challenging the government at the instigation of the West.

The student strikes came at a time when the government and the independent trade union Solidarity appeared to have settled for the time being widespread labor unrest, that Communist Party leader Stanislaw Kania was just back from trips to Czechoslovakia and East Germany where he tried to assure two of Poland's hard-line allies in the Warsaw Pact that the Polish leadership was in control of events.

New heart attack test found

BOSTON (AP) — A cheap, simple blood test will accurately predict the risk of heart attack among middle-aged men who smoke cigarettes, a French study shows.

The research, called the Paris Prospective Study, found that the more white cells in the men's blood, the greater their chances of suffering heart attacks.

They reached their conclusions after following the health of 7,000 Paris city workers for an average of 5½ years. The study was directed by Jean D. Dallow of the National Institutes of Health and Medical Research in Villejuif, France, and published in today's issue of the New England Journal of Medicine.

The report confirms a study published seven years ago that found that the white blood count is an accurate predictor of heart attack risk. But unlike the earlier research, this one found that the measurement only applies to men who smoke.

Calculating the number of white blood cells, or leukocytes, seems to be a far more accurate way of measuring heart attack risk than simply counting the number of cigarettes smoked, they found.

The relationship between smoking and blood counts only begins to appear when the men have more than 7,000 leukocytes per cubic millimeter.

Senate endorses new mini-store boycott

By KATHLEEN HOWLEY
Collegian Staff

The Undergraduate Student Senate voted last night to endorse a boycott of the new mini-stores in the Student Union Building. The senate also voted to send $1,000 to the Los ng Committee to set up a student-run newspaper stand across from the new store.

Arvid Miller, the student co-ordinator for the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy, said he believes the senate "represented the student's interest in calling for the boycott."

"Students felt that further action was necessary," Miller said. "The senate is just a way to legitimize it."

Miller said 3,000 signatures have been collected. Students, who are currently bringing suit against the UMass Board of Trustees, claim the $67,000 used to build the new mini-stores is state subsidized income.

Miller said 3,000 signatures have been collected in the past few days so as petitions demanding student control of the new store.

"There is a question as to the procedure the administration followed," Miller said. "They went ahead building it as if the students didn't exist."

Miller said William Harris, the director of the Campus Center, was invited to attend the senate meeting but said he declined to attend.

Miller said students are being asked to host needed items at other stores on campus. He said setting up an alternative newspaper stand shadows "can improve the state and still get the service they need."

UMass to fund salary for CCEBS

By DIANE KACHIS
Collegian Correspondent

The Student Government and the University of Massachusetts administration have reached an agreement which will have the state fund a salary position on the Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black Students(CCEBS) rather than the SGA.

Larry Kwon, chairman of the SGA Budget Committee, said the SGA in response to continue funding CCEBS as much as it has because CCEBS is an academic program and not a student activity group. He said the agreement is basically an effort to secure the position and to help "lift the burden from the shoulders of funding an academic position in a community program."

CCEBS is a program concerned with advancing the education of black students here at UMass. Thomas Atkinson of Special Programs Salary, L. Wade said, "at the very least this program will not be competing funding for the small salary from the SGA, nor will a negative decision by the Budget Committee result in the dismissal of a community employee."

It is unknown what the impact of the exchange will mean for CCEBS next semester. Kwon said, "details are still being worked out, he added.

New research project merges on campus

By ERIC SMITH
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts Polymer Science and Engineering Department has joined with the National Science Foundation (NSF) and 10 industrial corporations to form the Center for UMass Industry Research on Polymers.

The center is not a physical entity, but a "cooperative fundamental research project," involving the department's graduate faculty and, ultimately, 10 graduate and post-doctoral students, said Richard S. Stein.

Stein was one of the principal investigators of the NSF planning grant which led to the establishment of the center. Research is to be done in the general area of preparation and solid state properties of polymers.

Polymers are man-made long-chain molecule compounds which are found in plastics, resins, fibers and adhesives. A common household polymer product is epoxy-glue.

The corporations involved are Allied Chemical, Alcoa, AMOS, Celanese, Dow Chemical, Dow, DuPont, Exxon, General Electric, Kendall, Kodak, Monsanto, Union Carbide and Westinghouse.

Funding for the center is coming from the NSF which is now providing more than $2 million through a five-year grant to be given at an annually decreasing rate. The 10 private companies are making a commitment of $35,000 each. After the initial five-year phase the center will be virtually self-sufficient, dependent only upon industrial support of about $400,000 a year to break-even.

Both UMass and the companies stand to gain from the new center because any patents granted on discoveries made there will be shared by both the University and the companies. The contributing companies may use the discoveries royalty-free, but

Police suspect arson in early morning dormitory fire

A fire was reported in one of the 8th floor bathrooms of Brown residence hall in the Sylvan Residential Area Tuesday at 7:05 a.m. University of Massachusetts police said there are two suspects in the incident which is still under investigation. Police said heavy smoke was reported and a janitor was taken to the university infirmary where he was treated for smoke inhalation. An estimated $500 in damage was reported.

A 1970 Chevrolet Chevelle valued at $450 was stolen from parking lot 49 yesterday. UMass police said there are no suspects in the case.

A larceny of $664.07 in cash, checks and foodstamps was reported stolen from the People's Market co-op, police said. The incident, reported Tuesday afternoon, apparently took place between February 13 and February 17. There are no suspects in the case.

In another incident Tuesday, a hit and run accident was reported at 10:57 a.m. Police said a 1979 Ford parked in lot 25 received $485 in damage. The incident took place on February 13, police said. There are no suspects in the accident.

In another incident Tuesday morning, a radio and tape deck and two empty wine bottles were reported stolen from a 1979 Dodge van parked in lot 44. Total value of the stolen items is $360, police said. There are no suspects in the incident.

Later Tuesday morning, two telephones were apparently stolen from Goodell and the tower libraries, UMass police said. One of the telephones was taken from the fifth level of Goodell and the other from the second level of the tower library.

Pierpont dormitory to house center offering writing tutors

A new writing drop-in center, collaboratively sponsored by the English department, the Rhetoric Program, and Southwest Academic Affairs, has opened at 102 Pierpont in Southwest.

The Writing Center is an alternative to the classroom for students with writing problems.

The office in Pierpont is staffed by trained peer tutors who share the tasks of finding a subject, organizing a paper, revising a draft, or dealing with recurrent writing problems.

The Writing Center begins its spring semester on February 24 and is open 7 to 9 pm. on Sunday and Tuesday.

Looking back

By Carla Lesh

The Massachusetts Agricultural College Dramatic Society gave its first performance 70 years ago this week. "The Private Secretary" was presented at the Amherst Town Hall. The play was well received, according to the students' newspaper the College Signal which said "The house was well filled and the efforts of the players were rewarded with enthusiastic applause."

The annual Junior Promenade, a "successful social event well attended and enjoyed" lasted until 4 the next morning and featured waltzs, two-steps, and the scottishe. The prom committee included Alden C. Brett, Prof. A.A. Mackimmie and John E. Pierpont, among others.

E.B. Dickinson, D.D.S., had dental rooms in Amherst according to a Signal advertisement which stated "Ether and Nitrous Oxide Gas administered when desired."

Twenty years later, the February 26, 1931 issue of the Massachusetts Collegian listed as the outstanding event of the week, the win of the Aggies over Tufts University 26 to 15 in basketball. It was the first win over Tufts by the Aggies in any sport in four years.

Barselotti's was "Where the gang meets downtown/The best in Soda Fountain Service/and Tasty Toasted Sandwiches" according to an ad.

The Weston Grange presented a play written by a Mass Aggie Professor Frank Rand entitled "The Americans Come".

Ten years ago the Massachusetts Daily Collegian ran an article urging the change of the drinking age from 21 to 18. Dean of Students William Field said allowing 18 to 21 year-olds in bars would "Take some of the mystique, some of the aura, out of drinking."

The February 18, 1971 issue of the Collegian ran an article about the attempt to halt the Winter Carnival Queen Coronation by a UMass junior who felt the rights of the one male entry in the contest were being violated. The carnival officials had announced the male candidates write-in votes would be declared invalid. The contest was advertised as "Femme Fetale—if the five finalists don't have it, then no one does."

Store seeks harsh penalties

Shoplifters given no bargains

By CARLA R. LESH
Collegian Staff

"If you shoplift you may get an item worth a few cents, you may also lose an education worth many thousand's of dollars. "We do prosecute in District Court," reads a sign on the wall of the University Store, warning potential shoplifters.

Although the percentage of merchandise stolen from the University Store is lower than from stores in other universities, it is still a problem, said Winthrop Cummings, University Store manager.

The University Store employs UMass student security guards who are given on-the-job training and use direct observation to the store.

Cummings said about 400 people are stopped each year by the security guards.

"We only stop them when we think we are 100 percent sure they have stolen an item. We stop them when they have gone beyond the check out counters and then we try to do it as quietly as possible to prevent embarrassment," said David Gladstone, co-director of Security.

Most of the people stopped are given a show cause hearing through the Hampshire District Court, and the penalties can be harsh, Cummings said.

"It is a tragedy to spend four years to better yourself and try to get a better job if you ruin it by having a police record," Cummings said.

He said professors, undergraduate students and graduate students have all been stopped for shoplifting.

Harvard divests of Citicorp stock

CAMBRIDGE, (AP) — Harvard University sold nearly $50 million in Citibank notes and certificates of deposit because Citibank was loaning money to the government of South Africa, an official confirmed yesterday.

The investments were sold because of Harvard's policy, adopted April 28, 1978, that it will not hold debt instruments of a bank making a direct loan to the South African government.

The policy was adopted at the urging of students and others because of South Africa's racist policy of apartheid.

The sale was not announced but was confirmed by Lawrence F. Stevens, assistant general counsel and secretary of the university's Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility.

Stevens said there was "nothing sinister" in not announcing the sale, although there was some criticism on campus about the lack of publicity.

Stevens said Harvard announces its policy, and, once a year, reports its portfolio of holdings but does not announce investment sales or purchases.

He said he read last October that Citibank was participating with several other banks in a loan to the government of South Africa and he went to New York to verify the report.

YOUR TOWING RIGHTS

Last week a student was complaining that his car had been towed and thought he had been ripped-off by the towing company. Unfortunately, the student's situation is not unique. Most people only learn about their towing rights after they had paid the price for their ignorance.

If your car has been towed, call the local police department immediately. Your call should reveal when, why, and by whose authority your car was towed. You should also be advised of the process necessary for your car's release. Usually this procedure involves signing the register and picking up the receipt which will release your car to you upon presentation to the towing company.

If your car was towed without the authorization or consent of the police, you can reclaim your car without penalty or paying a storage fee. If your car was legally towed, make sure you understand under what violation it was towed. Rates for towing vary according to the type of violation. Ask the police officer if he knows what the maximum charge is for your particular type of tow.

When picking up your car, make sure you receive a copy of an itemized bill which lists all the services performed. The Massachusetts Department of Public Utilities (DPU) requires all towing companies to give such a bill to the consumer. Scrutinize the bill carefully. Make sure that: you are paying the correct charge for the correct time your car was in storage (a student was charged for three days of storage instead of the legitimate two days); you are not paying for anything listed as "miscellaneous"; and the reason for the tow is stated and concurs with the reason listed in the police record. Any deviation on the items listed above may make a difference on how much you may be charged.

The DPU has established maximum rates which may be charged for certain types of tow. To find out the correct charge for your type of tow you can call the DPU at (617) 727-3556. Unfortunately, at this time there is no ceiling on storage rates. If any other problems or questions develop concerning your tow, call the DPU or your local Consumer Action Center.

Smith production provides humor

By JONATHAN HAMILTON
Collegian Staff

As we are hit daily with idiosyncratic social behavior surrounding us under serious circumstances, it is a welcomed change to come across the treatment of one of those "eccentricities "in a clever and humourous manner. Such is the case after witnessining this past weekend's Smith College theater production, "The Woman Behind The Man Who Is A Woman." Written by a Smith College student, S. Paige Baty, the play deals with transsexualism ans the mirroring of the cross—dressed husband to his beleaguered wife.

As the play begins, the audience watches Lillian (Tanyss Rhea Martula modeling a long, evening gown in front of the everpresent mirred mirror, a symbol throughout the play. She is a writer determined to present her ideas about her husband's peculiarity in a magazine article.

Bob (Daniel M. Earnshaw) portrays a promising young lawyer, frequently fastidious and annoyed at his wife's lack of domestic ties. Here emerges the beginning of the juxtaposition when the audience senses a reversal of roles. There is a tantalizing moment when Bob foodles his wife's lingerie in a suggestive and longing manner.

The supporting cast compliments the production quite well, particularly Donnai (Rebecca Merril), the next door ghbor whose quips and outlandish remarks at the cocktail party amuse and entertain the audience. Bob's boss—interestingly enough a woman (Maura Ann Gaudet) and her companion, a male mate , are shocked when Bob can no longer conceal his strange habit as he "comes out" at the ty. Both of them are superb at taking on reverse stereotypic roles while interacting with the rest of the cast.

Ultimately, the play concludes as Lillian leaves Bob, for she can no longer tolerate living "with herself", Bob, taken aback by her departure, beseeches her to stay, making light of his problem and convincing her he could change back to the man she thought "was normal." But it is to no avail.

The Woman Behind The Man Who Is A Woman" must be applauded for its originality and cleverly—written script. Technically, director Elaine Bennett did a fine job, as did the light designers. The introductory music proved prophetically fitting as it encompassed the levity of the subject matter—especially the lyrics sung by Maggie Bell: "Queen of the Night."

Pope sends message to China

By EDITH M. LEDERER
Associated Press

MANILA, Philippines (AP) — Pope John Paul II urged China yesterday to resume ties with the Roman Catholic Church, bore a message of comfort to Manila's poorest slum dwellers and watched panicked security guards subdue a young man who rushed up to him.

During the second hectic day of his six-day visit to the Philippines, the pontiff also honored the country's 42 million Roman Catholics by giving them their first candidate for sainthood in a moving ceremony police said was attended by 3 million people.

In a series of appearences, the pope told the country's professional elite to serve the poor and not to worry about money and power. He then advised students at the University of Santo Tomas that the "pent-up energy" of youth doesn't frighten the church and told them to observe self discipline and "aim high."

As the pope was leaving the stage, 19-year-old university student Lou Calugcug broke through a security cordon and dashed toward him. Security agents grabbed him but Calugrag said he got a papal embrace.

"I kissed his hand and told him I loved him very much," the engineering student said. The incident, televised nationally, appeared to some as an attack on the pope and many thought the young man had a knife. He said he was carrying only a rosary and police released him after seven hours of questioning.

The pope's plea to China to forget the past and re-establish friendly relations with the Roman Catholic Church was coupled with assurances that the Vatican "desires no privileges" and has no political or economic goals in China or any other country.

State Rep. addresses waste problems

By ED LEVINE
Collegian Staff

The hazardous waste problem that has infected many areas of the state and nation has become a vital concern of lawmakers and no one is more aware of that than state Rep. Nicholas Paleologos of Woburn.

In his home town, located some 10 miles north of Boston, Paleologos said there is a problem with chemical wastes that, although only recently discovered, date back to the 1800's.

The Woburn problem is the Commonwealth's most celebrated case, but it is not the only one in the state. Locally, officials are investigating possible toxic contamination in Belchertown (see related story this page).

The most publicized case in the nation involves New York's Love Canal, where many residents have moved out of their homes due to chemical waste contamination.

Paleologos said Woburn's problem stems from chemical wastes dumped into the ground, legally, by pesticide manufacturers and tanneries as far back as the 1800's. The chemicals were dumped into "lagoons" or pits in an industrial area, now located near the junction of routes 93 and 128.

The problem was recently discovered when a local minister reported a high number of leukemia cases among children in his church. When a developer proposed to build homes on the site, tests of the ground revealed a high level of contamination. Paleologos said, however, that no scientific link has been established between chemical waste and high incidents of cancer.

Paleologos said after 10 to 15 years chemical wastes are fully absorbed into groundwater and mix with water supplies that are used in homes for drinking and washing.

"In the long run, the solution has got to be that we need to site a safe disposal facility. There's none in New England and there's no place to legally dump the stuff—not to excuse them," Paleologos said.

Belchertown investigates hazardous waste

By CHUCK KILFOYE
Collegian Staff

Hazardous waste dumping, which has become a major concern across the nation, is a problem in the Pioneer Valley as well, according to residents of the Bayside Road area of Belchertown who claim several of their water wells have been chemically contaminated.

"Four homes are without use of their water wells because the Board of Health closed them down," said Linda Barron, a member of the Belchertown Residents Action Coalition for the Environment (BRACE). "Four more homes show levels of contamination in their wells and the people are very nervous about using the water."

Northampton District Attorney Steven Kaplan said his office has investigated the well contamination and waste water from a nearby truck washing firm known as Belchertown Bulk Carriers.

"The Belchertown Bulk Carriers allowed tests to be made on their property and the results will go to the Grand Jury," Kaplan said. 'It will be up to the Grand Jury to return indictments."

The firm owned by Belchertown resident Claude Beaudoin, has since moved its operation to Springfield and is now called Milestone, Inc. A spokesperson for Milestone, Inc. declined to comment on a possible link between the firm and water contamination until the District Attorney's office releases its findings.

Paul Kwiatkowski of the Department of Environmental Quality Engineering's Hazardous Waste Unit, which tested the wells, said the initial report on Belchertown water well contamination was inconclusive. He said the State was in the process of getting more information.

"We are going to drill six new wells in three different locations over the next two weeks," said Kwiatkowski. "There will be three deep wells and three shallow wells, that way we will be able to determine the flow of the water."

He said, "after this is done we will be able to make a definite statement."

According to Barron, "the town is attempting to expand its water line to include residents who are without water because of the contaminated wells."

"However, to do that requires an act by the State Legislature," she said. "The town has obtained a National Guard water tanker for the residents to draw water from. The Highway Department fills it up at the High School and then hauls it down to Bayside Road.

"It is a frustrating situation," said Barron.

Building laws to be reformed

Most of the leaking, flooding and crumbling characteristic of University of Massachusetts buildings is due to the combined affects of aging and faulty construction. Nothing can be done to slow the progression of time, but there is a way to help keep from having obsolescence built into UMass structures.

This can be accomplished by changing the laws by which building contractors and subcontractors are chosen for building projects.

As the laws now stand, a state agency, such as UMass, must hire all subcontractors for a project before hiring a general contractor. These are termed filed sub-bid laws.

The agency puts out bids for subcontractors in as many as 17 trades, including electrical, roofing, plumbing, and masonary. The lowest bidder in each trade must be the one chosen for the project.

After all the various sub-contractors are hired the sum of their bids is the base cost for the project, general contracting costs are additional. The general contractor that comes out with the lowest bid in sum must be the one contracted for the project.

Building by filed sub-bid laws has two major drawbacks.

First, a general contractor, which is responsible for carrying out the project architect's plans, cannot hire subcontractors, which are generally ones it knows to be honest and reliable. Because they cannot hire their own subconstructors, the general contractor is absolved of responsibility for mistakes made by the sub-contractors it is supposedly overseeing. And so the roof may leak through 11 consecutive floors, as in the Campus Center, and there is no one with liability for the University to sue for damages.

Second, because only the lowest bid may be chosen, a sub-contractor is encouraged to submit unrealistically low bids to win the project, and use inferior and less expensive materials to stay within budget and use change orders during construction to cover cost overruns.

It has been estimated that this system has cost Massachusetts taxpayers more than $80 million in faulty contracts since 1968.

Private industry does not use a filed sub-bid system, and except for Massachusetts and Connecticut neither do any state governments in the Union—they cannot afford it.

Neither can we.

Legislation to reform the filed sub-bid laws is pending hearings in the House in the form of bill 2934. This bill, if passed, would change the laws to permit contractors to hire their own sub-contractors, for whom they would then be responsible.

Support of these reforms is needed, and the Governor and state legislature should approve them.

Cash kills, creation thrills

Bob Conte

Senior year. Last semester. Graduate in three months. And do what? Gotta get it together. What for? I'm ComSts. Nobody wants me. I'm screwed. Welfare's not so bad. Yes it is. Welfare stinks. Gotta get confident. Gotta get cool. Some sucker'll hire me for sure. I'm ComSts. I'm a creator. I'm bad.

Pick up University Placement Manual. I'm ComSts. I'm a creator. I'm bad. Corporation. Kodak. Lanxmas Combustion Engineering. Hughes Aircraft. Hughes wants me to join them "in making scientific and engineering history." Piss-off, Hughes. This kid aint no corporate stooge. Take your 23 grand starting salary and stick it. I eat calculators for lunch. I'm a creator. I'm bad.

Very bad. Horrible. Page eight. Outlook for Humanities and Fine Arts. English. Communications. Journalism. "While each of these disciplines is unique in its own right, the job market potential in any one of these areas is not plentiful." That's cool. This kid don't want no handouts. "In fact, few graduates in these fields of study actually find employment specifically allied to the particular area studied." What in goddamn hell is going on...Whoa. Cool your jets. Nobody promised me no rose garden.

Look up above. Under Engineering. "While the demand for engineering graduates is higher in some years than others, even in poor employment years, engineers remain in greater demand than most bachelor degree holders." Big deal. So they get jobs. Will you look at that sentence? Fragmented. Wordy. Unnecessary comma. Hey, I happen to care about proper use of the language. Don't nobody care about art no more? Bet some engineer wrote that sentence. They can't write. They aint creators. They aint bad. They sit around and multiply right angles all day. Great life, huh? For this they get 23 grand to start? I gotta laugh...Ha ha. Who needs 23 grand? Money only complicates life. I bet engineers gotta wear ties and jackets to work. Polished shoes. Creased slacks. This kid don't wear no slacks. Yeh, I wear pants. I'll only take in three grand but I'll wear whatever the hell I please. I aint no corporate fashion plate. Cre-A-Tor.

I'll get a job. Creators get jobs. It's a fact. Michelangelo had a job. Picasso had a job. Did very well for themselves too. Hemingway had a job but he shot himself. Probably 'cause he was making too much money. Bet lots of first-year engineers kill themselves. They see all those numbers on their paychecks and they freak. Intense guilt attacks. "Hey, I aint worth all this dough. I'm just a faceless calculator puncher. I aint bad." Then they whip out an exacto knife and, whamme, blood all over the place. Maybe the company'll pay for the funeral. Maybe it won't. Big money kills. It's a fact.

My creative friends and I don't care for big money. Sure, we want jobs. We're not lazy. We like to work. And we like to work stoned. Yeh, that's right. And we aint gonna compromise our freedom and individuality. Cause creation's a free and individual process. That's how it's gotta be. That's how we become writer's writers, and artist's artists, and filmmaker's filmmakers. I aint stuttering. I'm making a point.

And if one of my projects happens to make it big, that's cool. I'm not gonna give the money back. I earned it. And if Mike or Merv wants to rap for a while, no problem. Or say People wants me for a cover, then so be it. They're gonna have to pay though. 'Cause People's got big bucks. Big bucks. And if Coppola wants to fly me out to Hollywood to discuss a script, fine. I'll fly. But I'll fly first class. And I'll want free drinks. Lots of 'em. With shaved ice. I'll probably want to talk to the networks while I'm in L.A.

'Cause T.V.'s where it's at for a creator. 'Cause you get to create one half hour creation every week. And they pay, baby. And you get to work with blondes. Lots of tall blondes. With huge chests. And they give you hot tubs, and valium prescriptions, and your own briefcase. And you tan. Oh, how you tan cruising Sunset in your convertible. I want an Alfa. No, something big. I want a Lincoln. A big silver Lincoln. With leather interior. Yeh. To match the briefcase...

Letter

I am writing in response to the letter which appeared in Tuesday's Collegian, entitled Concert Plans Conflict In Purpose. If our SGA co-Presidents are so set in taking every penny out of our (the taxpayer's) pockets for more costly and highly destructive concerts, then UMass deserves the reputation it has as a "party place."

There is a limit to everything, including the maximum that can and logically should be spent on the spring concert. This limit should be set by us, the students, and not by how much the total bill is for. If we don't pay the $10 a ticket, who do you think is going to? Our parents, our neighbors and the rest of the state taxpayers, of course. They handle all of our overruns. Or maybe we can simply add it to our SGA debt, which is running in the red close to one million dollars? Who actually knows?

With all the residence area spring concerts, don't you think it repetitive enough without having a University spring concert.

The whole problem is too few control the money of the many. Who says we even want to see the same bands the SGA co-Presidents Rich LaVoice and Rich Moran want here at this year's spring concert. Wouldn't you rather have the option of attending the spring concert than being pickpocketed for a concert that less than 50 percent of the students bothered to pick up their tickets for last year?

It is hoped that more students are here for their degrees first, and their social lifestyle second. In the future, this money could be more wisely spent on keeping our bus routes in service. Certainly, safe and usable buildings are a lot more important than buying tickets, where you don't even know who's appearing until you pick up the tickets which, by no decision of your own, you have already payed for. There are many RSO groups that serve a larger total number of UMass students than the spring concert does. Too few of these groups receive funding from our activity fees ($42.00 per semester).

Remember this: It is easy for someone to take your money and produce a show from it. It is much harder for them to produce a show and then convince you to spend your money on seeing it. In the first case you might get your money's worth, in the second you definitely know whether it was worth the cost.

Openings highlights student dance concert

By LISA LANGONE
Collegian Correspondent

Friday night's performance of the University of Massachusetts Student Dance Concert was an interesting presentation of seven original pieces, choreographed and produced by some of the student performers.

One of the impressive pieces shown was "Openings", choreographed and performed by Margaret Albertson. It was a beautiful and highly dramatic piece, revealing much sensitivity from within the dancer. In its style of modern dance, "Openings" moved with great strength. The dramatics of this dance were emphasized by the use of gracefully extended arms, and by the dancer reaching for something beyond her, then dynamically contracting before moving on to the next motion.

"Swan Fake", a satirical ballet choreographed by Kathleen Bistany, and done to the music of Tchaikovsky, was a comical piece. It was an attempted performance of a part of "Swan Lake", that was repeatedly interrupted by a typical night janitor. As a result, the mishaps he caused were funny.

Who ever said, "the best is always saved for last", was absolutely correct. The two final pieces were truly the most commendable. "To Be Like Her," a splendidly choreographed piece by Nancy Marshall, and danced to Tim Weisberg's music, was an extremely pleasurable piece. The colors were soft and warm, and the women danced wonderfully in somewhat of a mirror's image. This can be a difficult endeavor as far as timing the movements simultaneously, but it was done successfully by Nancy Arzberger and Julia Cobb. The mood of the dance was harmonious, and the performance was one of exceptional merit.

The one other outstanding, as well as the concluding, piece of the evening was "Odd Permutation" choreographed by Donna Castelberry to music of Tom Dissevelt and Kid Baltan. It was an avant-garde and highly abstract dance. It was entertaining with wildly imaginative lighting effects, and the use bright costuming. The two principal dancers of "Odd Permutations", Julia Cobb and Eugene Niles, should certainly be noted for giving fine perfomances. They were both dynamic in the unusual shapes and forms they created together.

In addition to the program at the concert, were "Don't Cost You Nothing", a showy jazz piece choreographed by Donna Joyce, "Summertime", another flashy piece done to a jazzy version of the song Summertime from "Porgy and Bess", and "Oh Ya!", a playful dance choreographed by Gayle Gammal, and done to an interesting choice of modern music by Bette Midler and the Vapors.

end to everything we believe in and to our dreams for the future,"

"For too long now, we've removed from our people the decisions on how to dispose of what they created. We have strayed from first principles. We must alter our course," he said.

"We will continue to fulfill the obligations that spring from our national conscience," Reagan declared. "Those who through no fault of their own must depend on the rest of us, the poverty stricken, the disabled, the elderly, all those with true need, can rest assured ..."

The regulatory revisions are intended to reduce "the government-imposed barriers to investment, production, and employment," said the president's inch-thick book "America's New Beginning — A Program for Economic Recovery."

As the details of the president's program became known, it became apparent that he was breaking three campaign promises: To cut two percent — $13.5 billion — from the fiscal 1981 budget, to balance the budget by 1983, and possibly by 1982, and to cut personal income taxes as of Jan. 1.

Under Reagan's proposal, the 1981 budget, now in effect, would be reduced by $4.4 billion.

Administration officials portrayed the program as one "designed to literally turn around the economy, stimulate growth and employment simutaneously with a substantial reduction in inflation."

One official said that the deficit could be financed "through personal savings, rather than ... through monetary policy."

The president's budget for 1982, revised from the federal spending program prepared by the Carter administration, calls for 83 specific spending reductions.

Reagan's program represents the first modern test of the socalled "supply side" theory of economics.

The theory says that high inflation, unemployment and stagnant economic growth can be fought by increasing the flow of goods and services to meet increased demand. This would be accomplished through tax cuts intended to prompt individuals to save and businesses to invest in expansion. Conventional economists, who have been influential in previous administrations both Democratic and Republican, have used federal taxing and spending policies to adjust demand to fit supply levels.

The economy has been the central focus of Reagan's 29 days in office, as he met with Cabinet members, White House aides, labor and business representatives and local and state officials while his budget office sought ways to pare the Carter administration's spending proposals.

The pressures that were applied on the administration by special interest groups seeking protection for their constituents' share of the federal budget will shift to Capitol Hill when Congress takes up the budget proposals and begins work on the tax program.

"But government will not continue to subsidize individuals or particular business interests where real need canot be demonstrated," Reagan said.

Reagan met yesterday morning with Senate and House leaders to brief them on his first formal address to Congress. He promised the bipartisan group that the rich and poor would be treated equally under his program.

His proposed cuts in the fiscal 1982 budget, which takes effect Oct. 1, represent the greatest reduction any president has recommended in federal spending, although the budget of $695.5 billion would be the largest in the nation's history.

The president forecasts an inflation rate of 6.2 percent in 1983. It was 12.4 percent last year.

Reagan's proposals would:

Paleologos said since a safe dumping site does not exist in this area, companies must transport hazardous waste at great expense to dumps in Ohio or Tennessee. To avoid this cost, many companies have been dumping the chemicals illegally.

Paleologos said the priority of the hazardous waste committee will be to educate the public that there are safe ways to dispose of waste products and then find a suitable location somewhere in New England. Efforts to locate a dump in Connecticut were defeated by residents last year.

"We have to educate people as to the state of the art of disposal facilities and find an acceptable location," Paleologos said.

★ Budget

—Provide a net increase in 1982 defense spending of $4.3 billion, boosting the Pentagon's share of the federal budget from 24.1 percent to 32.4 percent by 1984.

—Reduce individual income tax rates by 10 percent a year for three years beginning July 1. This would save a family of four, with wages of $20,000, 28.7 percent of their tax bill, or $1,456, by the end of 1984, a Treasury official said.

—Revise business depreciation schedules to provide speedier tax writeoffs, at a cost to the treasury of $9.7 billion in fiscal 1982.

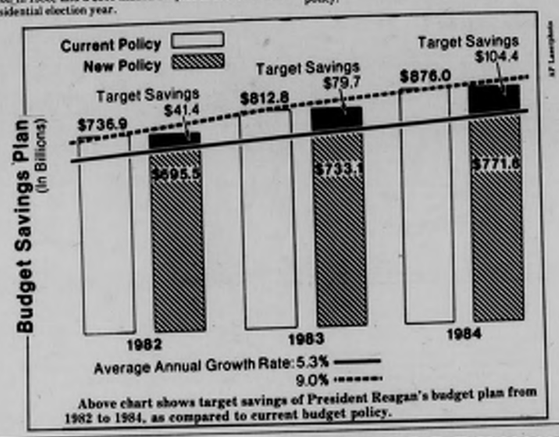
—Project a budget deficit of $45 billion in 1982 and $22.9 billion in 1983, and a $500 million surplus in 1984, the next presidential election year.

—Increase the percentage of the federal budget spent on what the administration calls "safety net" programs protecting the truly needy who need government assistance to survive. This figure would rise from 36.6 percent in 1981 to 40.6 percent in 1984.

—Reduce some subsidies and benefits for middle and upperincome people. But it would not cut various features of the tax laws that benefit special groups such as homeowners, who are allowed to deduct mortgage interest.

In addition, Reagan wants to increase the fees charged for the maintenance of inland waterways and for the support services the government provides for airplane travel, by $2 billion. One government official said this could cost air travelers $1 billion.

Coupled with the spending and tax proposals were changes in the federal regulatory process and monetary policy.



Above chart shows target savings of President Reagan's budget plan from 1982 to 1984, as compared to current budget policy.

Budget cuts affect everyone

By MIKE FEINSILBER
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — If you ride the bus, own a yacht or an outboard, raise cows, go to college or sing operatic arias for a living, you ought to pay attention to what President Reagan is saying about spending. He's talking about you.

Millions of people would lose more than they gain, even though everybody who pays federal taxes would benefit from what Reagan laid out last night in the most drastic economic proposal since Franklin D. Roosevelt came up with the New Deal.

Reagan's idea is to take away or dilute government aid programs. This will affect the poor and the very wealthy, but the great masses of middle class people who elected him will especially feel the change.

Reagan hopes the prospect of a quick, sharp cut in the inflation rate — benefiting everybody — will peruade Congress and the people to go along with him.

In his message to Congress, Reagan said programs that help middle income families and the rich are where the big spending occurs and so are "an obvious focal point" of a plan to curtail inflation.

That means a family sending a youngster to college on a government grant or a low-

Economic plan: a summary

WASHINGTON (AP) — Here are the highlights of the economic package President Reagan proposed to Congress on Wednesday:

IN SUMMARY

The president called for a "fundamental re-direction" of the government that includes budget reductions, individual and business tax cuts and reduced federal regulations, all designed to reduce inflation and unemployment and stimulate economic growth.

THE BUDGET

For fiscal 1981, already nearly five months old, Reagan proposed maximum budget cuts of $4.4 billion. For fiscal 1982, he proposed $41.4 billion in program cuts that would be partially offset by a $4.3 billion net increase for defense; $5.7 billion in cuts in federally subsidized loan programs that are not listed in the budget and a $2 billion increase in fees for people using federally run waterways and airways.

Reagan's 1982 budget calls for $695.5 billion in spending and $695.5 billion in revenues, for a deficit of $45 billion. The budget would not be balanced until 1984 at the earliest. Former President Jimmy Carter's budget for 1982 called for $758.3 billion in spending and $735.4 billion in revenues, for a deficit of $22.9 billion.

PROGRAM CUTS

Social aid, or "entitlement," programs would be restricted to limit help to the neediest. Spending cuts for food stamps, child nutrition, extended unemployment, impact related education assistance, student loans, black lung, Medicaid, disability insurance, Social Security for students, minimum Social Security payments, low income housing subsidies, welfare and federal employment would save $9.4 billion in 1982.

Programs considered "nonessential" or "ineffective" would be eliminated or cut back. Public service jobs would be phased out, and spending would be reduced for Amtrak and other mass transit subsidies, the Postal Service, education, health care, the arts, public broadcasting and foreign aid.

Commission and other economic development programs, synthetic fuel and alternative energy development, sewage treatment and water projects, highway and airport construction and subsidized loans provided through the Rural Electrification Administration, Farmers Home Administration and Export-Import Bank.

TAX CUTS

Personal income tax rates would be reduced 10 percent a year for three years in a row, beginning July 1. Tax rates now range from 14 percent to 70 percent of income, but would be reduced to a range of 10 percent to 50 percent by 1984. For a family of four with an income of $20,000 and a current tax bill of $2,013, the cut would save $114 in 1981 and $578 in 1984. The reduction would cost the Treasury $6.4 billion in fiscal 1981 and $44.2 billion in 1982.

Business taxes also would be cut, retroactive to Jan. 1, by giving companies an accelerated schedule for writing off the cost of capital purchases on their tax forms. The tax cut, designed to stimulate investment in plant expansion and modernization, would cost the Treasury $1.4 billion in 1981 and $8.7 billion in 1982.

REGULATIONS

Government regulations would be reduced if they are "unnecessary, duplicative, ineffective, ineffective or simply not justified." The Office of Management and Budget would be given expanded powers to review most regulations.

RESULTS

If fully adopted by Congress, Reagan's program would cut inflation in half within two years and restore healthy economic growth, the administration predicts. Inflation as measured by the Consumer Price Index, would decline from 12.4 percent in 1980 to 10.5 percent this year, 7.7 percent in 1982, 6 percent in 1983 and 4 percent by 1984. Real economic growth would average between 4 percent and 5 percent a year beginning in 1982. Unemployment, now 7.4 percent, would rise to 7.7 percent by the end of 1981, then decline steadily to 7 percent at the end of 1982, 6 percent in 1983 and 5.4 percent by 1984.

interest loan may no longer qualify. The administration wants to revise loan and grant programs so that $30,000-a-year families will no longer qualify and other families will have to pay a bigger share of college costs.

Yacht owners — and owners, too, of outboards and all sorts of vessels aided by Coast Guard activities — are asked by Reagan to pay fees. The idea is to compensate government for what it spends on their behalf for everything from maintaining buoys to providing rescue helicopters.

A boat owner who runs out of gasoline and has to be towed ashore by the Coast Guard would be charged a fee for that service, under Reagan's plan. He said the Transportation Department would submit the details in March.

Dairymen would see the removal of some government props under their livelihoods. Reagan proposed to eliminate an increase in dairy price supports that would go into place April 1. He predicted milk prices would fall. He also indicated that some dairy—farmers would go out of that business.

Bus and subway riders would pay higher fares. Reagan proposed phasing out mass transit subsidies. He said fares have been artificially low since the 1973 oil embargo.

A taxpayer in Iowa should not have to pay taxes so that a Los Angeles commuter can ride the bus cheaply, the president argued.

Swimmers face Amherst

By ANNA ROELL
Collegian Correspondent

The UMass men's swim team record now stands at 4-5 after Wednesday's victory against Central Connecticut 72-39, and tonight they face Amherst College for their last meet of the season.

The swimmers knew Central Conn. was not going to be a tough meet so they swam off events (events they usually would not swim) according to UMass coach Russ Yarworth.

The change proved successful. UMass took the first event, the 400 medley relay, with a time of 3:50.48. Swimming the relay was Seth LaChance, Howard Abramson, brian Spellman, and Thomas Dundon. The second event the 1000 yard freestyle took both first and second with Phil Surrette as Christopher Porter swimming times of 11:03.48 and 11:07.86 respectively.

Spellman took first in the 50 yard freestyle with a time :22.29 The 200 yard individual medley was won by the UMass DeCosinck finished first and second with came back for a victory on the 3 meter times of 2:06.40 and 2:19.16. And the 500 yard freestyle was won by UMass swimmers Michael Boucher and Steven Samuels with the times of 5:13.00 and 5:21.04.

UMass really took over in both the one and three meter diving events. John McCurdy finished first on one meter with a total of 199.20 points, followed by Dan Athony and John Findlay. Dan Anthony came back for a victory on the 3 meter board for a total of 248.45 points and McCurdy and Findlay finished behind him. "The results were as expected," Yarworth said. Tomorrow's meet should be really close, but I think we have the upper hand."

That meet is tonight at Amherst College at 7 p.m. "We want to be the best swim team in Amherst , and we want to even our record at 500," Yarworth said.

Women skiers prepare for Easterns

By ANTONY KUNDERT
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's ski team will compete in the Eastern Championships this Friday and Saturday at Brodie Mt. in Ashford. The team qualified by being the top team in the Womens Intercollegiate Ski Conference (WISC) with seven wins and two second place finishes against the six teams in the league.

The team will have their hands full as it faces some of the top ski powers in the country. Schools such as the University of Vermont, Middlebury College, and Dartmouth head the list. All three of these schools have former members of the U.S. ski team competing.

UMass will field a five women squad consisting of Sweepy Voll, Theresa Collins, Sue Gundy, Bobbi Voll, and Kim Loftus. Loftus replaces Chris Fraiser who broke her arm in last Monday's giant slalom race at Loon Mt. N.H. The accident occurred when she caught her ski in some heavy snow and crashed into the last gate of the course. The loss of Fraiser to the team will hurt it's performance as she was just begining to ski well, as shown by her third place finish for the team the day before.

The first five teams in the Eastern Championships qualify to go to the AIWI National Intercollegiate Ski Championships being held at Bozeman, Montana. With the fierce competition from the Division One schools UMass has little chance of qualifying for the Nationals. However, individuals may qualify if they come in the top 15 in either of the two events. The person with the best shot from UMass is Sweepy Voll. Last year she was able to finish both races at the Easterns in the low twenties. With an additional year of college racing expeience she should be able to improve on that and possibly crack the top 15.

★Hoopwomen

Beaudreau and Tami Whatley, who led the Owls with 18 points, cut the UMass lead to one, 18-17, before a Gena DePeano jumper put the Owls up 19-18 with five minutes left in the half.

The lead see-sawed back and forth six times before a neat feed from Jenny Gray to Ready gave UMass the 29-23 halftime advantage.

Whately continued her outside assault into the second half as Southern built up a five-point lead, 37-32, with 13:37 left. UMass, which shot just 35 percent on the day, had trouble getting the ball low for the first 10 minutes of the half, but two Ready jumpers, a fallaway from Sue Carey, and a Ready layup got the lead back, 38-37, at the 11:20 mark.

Two Beaudreau free throws gave the Owls a 53-50 lead with 3:40 left in regulation, but Collins went to work. At 2:55, Collins put up a 20-foot prayer from the right-side top of the key which, after a foul, turned into a three-point play to tie the game.

After two Whatley hoops put the Owls up 57-53, another Collins top-of-the-key set shot cut the lead to two. Southern Conn.'s Kathy Curley went back door for a lay up and a seemingly safe 59-55 lead with 37 seconds left in regulation.

Ball game?

Uh-uh.

Legare calmly sank two, Collins stole the ball and got it inside to Ready, whose 10-foot turnaround rolled around the rim, bounced up, then down on through to send the game to overtime.

UMass controlled the tap and Collins hit two bombs for a 63-59 lead. Beaudreau hit from downtown, then tied it, but Ms. Ward hit nothing but net from the left baseline with 54 seconds left, then added two free throws in a clutch one-and-one situation, and a season was saved.

OT win buoys playoff hopes

By KEVIN CULLEN

It was a game you write home to Ma about.

Facing virtual playoff elimination yesterday, the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team came back from a four-point deficit in the last 29 seconds of regulation, then went on to post a 67-63 overtime victory against a stubborn Southern Connecticut team at the Cage.

UMass (14-11) came back on two Ginger Legare free throws and a Julie Ready basket, made possible by a Sherry Collins steal of an inbounds pass, which tied the score at 59-59 and sent the game into overtime.

From there, Collins and freshman guard Wendy Ward took over, scoring all eight UMass points in the overtime to keep Massachusetts playoff hopes alive.

"We needed this one," said UMass head coach Mary Ann Ondarski. "Anytime you can come from behind like that and win in overtime, you've got to be happy. And our kids made their own breaks today—they deserved this one."

Almost lost in the excitement were some key individual performances, led by a quiet game-high 27 points from Ready, an awesome rebounding display by Nadine Jackson, Collins' dramatic play off the bench, and Ward, who scored a career-high 16.

It was Jackson's overall play that kept UMass in the game early, as the freshman from Amherst took control of the first half boards, grabbing 11 of her 20 rebounds while the whole Southern Conn. team could only grab nine in the half. Jackson ended with seven points, four steals, three blocked shots, and her 20 rebounds.

It was Ward who was a measure of consistency on a team that has lacked such a quality of late. The Brooklyn native hit five of ten shots from the floor, while hitting all six free throw attempts.

But, it was Ms. Collins, another Amherst girl, who did most to turn yesterday's game around. Collins didn't score any of her nine points until 2:55 left in regulation, but from there put on a brief clinic on How To Win Games With Big Plays.

In a first half that could only be characterized as sloppy, UMass built a shaky 26-23 lead, shooting just 33 percent (9 for 27) from the floor while committing 13 turnovers. UMass was up by as much as eight mid-way through the half when a Ward jump shot made it 16-8. But Southern Conn.'s Cindy

BU downs men

The University of Massachusetts men's basketball team had Boston University head coach Rick Pitino literally tearing his clothes off in frustration in this one due to Massachusetts' comeback hustle in the second half.

But even with this strong surge from the Minutemen, BU hung on for the 61-56 victory marking their fourth consecutive win.

The Minutemen were playing with these guys all throughout the first half. As late as 4:20 in the half, BU was only up two buckets, 23-19, when Pitino sent in the press defense at about the midway point, the UMass offense sputtered and finally stalled completely.

Surprisingly, Terrier guard Tony "I'll shoot from anywhere" Simms, was not much of a factor throughout the contest. In the first half, he shot an ice cold 3 for 8, forcing up several unnecessary shots. Credit should go to Tony DePina, who played some tight, physical "D" on Simms and caused many of these poor shots. Simms heated up in the second period, finishing with 13, but he still did not contribute the big hoop when it was needed.

At the ten minute mark of the second half with BU up 48-32 it looked as though the Minutemen were headed for another stinging loss, but Edwin Green (15 pts., 12 reb.), thought otherwise and scored six quick points and blocked a shot which led to another UMass hoop to bring his team within 10, 48-38. With this, the emotional level of the crowd rose and it grew infectious.

The Minutemen began to play some ball. Ty Whitehead (who was chairman of the boards for much of the second half) pulled a spinning board out of Simms' grasp and whipped it underneath for a Bill Bayno layup.

Pitino started undressing.

Green rejected Johnnie Ray Wall, picked up the ball and threw a sure TD to Bayno who was fouled and hit both free shots. BU led 52-46, and the crowd was roaring. Green buried another Simms prayer and tossed it to DePina. DePina found Whitehead to the left. Whitehead then won some fans for next year with a behind the back, between the legs, over the shoulder scoop which brought the home team within two 54-52.

Pitino went back to his press and the game struggled on in the same fasion for the time remaining on the clock. BU just kept coming to the boards, and drawing fouls on the Minutemen and UMass wound up on the backside of another one.

Collins stole the ball...and so a season saved

By KEVIN CULLEN
Collegian Staff

When Sherry Collins stole the basketball yesterday afternoon, one got the strangest feeling of deja vu. Somewhere in the Cage, there rang out the raspy voice of Johnny Most, but instead of screaming "Havlicek stole the ball!", the name was Collins.

Collins stole the ball.

It wasn't merely a steal—it was a season. After the steal, Collins fed Julie Ready and the senior co-captain hit the basket which sent the game with Southern Connecticut into overtime, and allowed the UMass women's basketball team to escape with a 67-63 win, a hit washed, but still alive for a playoff berth in the Eastern Softballs.

"I wasn't really looking for the steal," Collins said after the strangest come-from-behind victory. "I thought they had got the ball in play already, but when I heard no whistle and 'Time' screaming five seconds, the time allowed to inbound a ball, I knew that the ball wasn't in yet."

From there, Collins darted out through a maze of players and came up with the ball.

"Sherry's made some steals before," said a relieved UMass assistant coach Steve Jefferson, "but that was her best ever."

UMass head coach Mary Ann Ondarski could only nod in agreement.

"Sherry made a great play—it made up for the two lay ups she missed earlier," Ondarski said with a smile.

It was Collins, the junior guard from Amherst, who brought UMass within striking distance late in regulation time, with a three-point play off a shot from downtown that had Ondarski off the bench as it was in the air.

"We wanted to get the ball low, but Sherry put it up anyway," Ondarski explained. "It was one of those shots that you say 'No, No!' then 'Yeah, yeah!' when it goes in."

In it went, as did two more Collins bombs to open the overtime before Wendy Ward, who scored a career-high 16, iced the victory with a baseline jumper and two free throws.

UMass now has a week's layoff before next Wednesday's encounter with Keene State, which will mark the last regular season appearance of co-captains Julie Ready and Ginger Legare.

"I just want the kids to get some rest," said Ondarski. "We've been just ran-ragtown lately, and hopefully this rest will help."

But, yesterday afternoon, most minds weren't thinking of taking it easy for a week.

Wendy Ward came padding out in stocking feet five minutes after the game ended, and someone facetiously suggested that UMass should try to make their games more exciting.

"Okay," Wendy Ward said with a smile. "We'll try to be more dramatic."

Gymnasts top Owls

By MARY SZTELLA

Put a beautiful spring-like day together with an exciting win for the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastic team and you get a dynamite combination.

The UMass women nudged by a tough Southern Connecticut squad 131.35-130.30 last night in front of a good-sized and enthusiastic crowd of approximately 400 in Connecticut.

"When you [live sheet] it, the the meter an all our other wins," UMass coach Virginia Evans said. "It was another team win. Different people pulling through at different times when you really need them most."

For first two events, the vault and the uneven bars, are Southern Connecticut taking the lead by 10.15-10.10 behind the agility of the their Kristy Clark and Robin Fenn's.

But the superb performances and finish Wilmette on it and Chris Wilson skills on the balance beam kept the Minutemenwomen close. Wilmette and Wilson, consistent all season, topped personal records on the beam.

The comeback of Chris Amy Hall in the floor exercises sparked a last minute stretch of excitement. Hall, a junior that team out recently with a shoulder injury, throng routines on the floor exercises by Karen Cheesmore and Robin Love acted to finish off "a real thriller".

UMass, a team people have been watching quite closely as Chris, boosted their record to 7-1. The team will travel to the University of New Hampshire (in a meet on Sunday at 1:30.

Officials say budget cuts will 'devastate' education

BOSTON — An estimated 10,000 to 20,000 students may have to drop out of college in Massachusetts if President Reagan's proposed cuts are approved by Congress, education officials predicted yesterday.

"It would have a devastating effect on Massachusetts higher education," said Joseph Cronin, head of the Massachusetts Higher Education Assistance Corporation, at a news conference. The state sponsored corporation coordinates and guarantees low-interest student loans made by banks.

Under the Reagan proposals, the federal government would stop subsidizing part of the interest on the loans, which are now offered at the below market rate of 9 percent, Cronin said. The amount of money available for the loans would be cut by about one-third, and families with incomes of more than $30,000 a year would no longer be eligible.

"We think the consequences will be very dramatic," Cronin said, noting that last year 112,000 Massachusetts college students borrowed $253 million through the state-run loan program.

Cronin said that of the 200,000 undergraduate students attending college in Massachusetts, an estimated 10,000 to 20,000 would not be able to afford to finish their education without the subsidized loans.

Sharing Cronin's fears about the effects of the Reagan proposals on higher education were Laura B. Clausen, chancellor of the Massachusetts Board of Higher Education; Kenneth Ryder, president of Northeastern University, and John B. Duff, president of the University of Lowell.

Duff charged that Reagan's proposed cuts appeared to be offered "almost offhand."

"You cannot pare down a structure overnight that has been carefully constructed... and that has been effective in promoting a democratic, broadbased system of higher education," Duff said.

Duff said the Reagan proposals would drastically reduce higher education opportunities for minorities and the poor.

"Just when some groups of society the have-nots are beginning to participate, the system is going to end," Duff said.

Campus factions debate fees, mini-store

By KEVIN McGUIRE

BOSTON—The University of Massachusetts Building Authority yesterday unanimously approved a $60 dormitory rent increase but declined to vote on the controversial installation of a convenience store in the Student Union Building.

After the authority's six members approved the rent increase in a 25-minute executive session, UMBA General Counsel Morris Goldings told them not to vote on the construction of the store because they had no legal jurisdiction over the matter.

Both the rent hike and the construction of a $47,000 store are subjects of a suit filed in Hampshire Superior Court in Northampton by 40 UMass students against the school's Board of Trustees.

UMBA ok's dorm rent increase of $60

The suit charges that the trustees illegally approved the increases and the construction in violation of a legal agreement between the Board and the Building Authority.

During the 90-minute meeting Goldings said the agreement called the Management and Services Agreements, only required Authority approval on work dealing with the initial construction of buildings, repairs from construction defects and insurance money from damages.

The suit, which is pending before Superior Court judge Raymond Cote, claims the agreement applies to any repairs or renovations over $5000. The next hearing in the case is scheduled for March 2.

Yesterday's meeting, which was held at the law firm of Gaston, Snow, and Bartlett, was the first in almost 15 months. The next meeting is scheduled for April 2 in Boston.

In other business, UMass Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance George Beatty told the authority that work underway on the troubled Campus Center Garage had run into difficulties. Beatty said newly installed pillars supporting concrete beams in the garage are redistributing the weight of the building and causing stress cracks in other beams.

Beatty said, however, that the garage, which has undergone $1,500,000 in repairs since 1978, is safe and that repairs will continue during the spring.

CC Board of Governors claims it never approved renovations

By GREG VOLPE
Collegian Staff

As a result of the ongoing litigation over the newly built Student Union Mini-Store, the Campus Center Board of Governors discussed last night problems which have resulted in present student confusion and anger over the renovations.

> "...although the board did not disapprove of the renovations, we did not approve of them either."
> —Brian DeLaney, BOG Chairman

One of the most highly debated points before the Board was the somewhat confusion over who initially approved the renovations before construction began in December 1980.

William Harris, the present Campus Center director, argued that when the renovations first came up for discussion in February 1980, the BOG, then, did not disapprove of the renovations. He declared the Board could by signatures on the renovations too late.

"Because the spring Board like existing Board of Governors in the spring of 1980 made no objections to the renovations when they were first discussed, the Campus Center Administration went on with them."

Newly elected BOG chairman, Brian DeLaney, however, disagrees with Harris. "The renovations were not initially brought to the Board as a motion and, therefore, although the Board did not disapprove of the renovations, we did not approve of them either."

Jack Delmond, president of the Graduate Student Senate, said that although he felt the Board was "negligent" in their handling of the situation, he also saw a future need for more student input into Campus Center or Student Union renovations.

"It would be in the best interest of the Campus Center Administration, and the students, to have some sort of formal mechanism for more input between the students and the administrators," he said.

In an unrelated action, Greg Dennis, member of the Commission to Restore the Blue Wall, said a letter will appear in next Thursday's Collegian for students to be consulted in submitting names for the renaming of the Blue Wall.

He said the names, along with the present "Blue Wall" name, will be selected by the committee for students to vote on at a later date. The student who submits the winning name, Dennis said, will win $50 and a dinner for two at the Top of the Campus.

Reagan expects budget support

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan, opening an intensive lobbying drive for his tax and budget cutting proposals, said yesterday he is confident of the nation's support and despite initial skepticism from congressional Democrats "no one will want to stand up and oppose the spending cuts."

Generating public pressure for his sweeping program emerged as the key element of Reagan's strategy for convincing Congress to cut $41 billion from the pending federal budget and to agree to reducing personal income tax rates over three years, starting July 1.

Six members of the Reagan Cabinet were on Capitol Hill to try to sell the program to congressional committees.

But the pitch hardly was limited to official appearances. Cabinet secretaries appeared on television interview shows and were unusually accessible to reporters eager for detail.

White House aides were working with Reagan supporters outside government, meanwhile, to coordinate efforts to generate public pressure for the proposals.

Opponents also were hard at work. Much of the criticism from congressional Democrats centered on the tax cuts. Labor leaders vowed to fight some of the program cuts.

Less than 12 hours after he outlined his program in a nationally broadcast speech to a joint session of Congress, Reagan had breakfast at the White House with newspaper editors and broadcast executives and told them, "We believe the main source of strength in this fight is the people themselves."

Asked about opposition from organized labor, Reagan replied that sometimes labor leaders were "out of step with their rank and file. They were in the last election."

After the meeting, Reagan flew to California for a four-day vacation during which aides said he would lobby members by telephone.

On Capitol Hill, administration officials and their Republican allies in Congress urged quick action on the Reagan program.

"Failure to act promptly would be almost criminal in nature," said Sen. William Roth, R-Del., who said he would try to get Congress on record favoring action by May 31.

Senate Majority Leader Howard H. Baker Jr., R-Tenn., predicted the Senate would act "very promptly, indeed," on the budget cutting proposals. But he also said the tax cuts could run into severe opposition. Bob Dole, R-Kan., chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, has expressed skepticism about a three-year program of across-the-board cuts in tax rates.

David Stockman, Reagan's budget director, urged senators to approve the tax and budget proposals "rapidly and as a package."

Postage increase ok'd

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Postal Rate Commission approved yesterday a 3-cent increase for first-class mail and added another two cents to the price of a dime postcard. The increases could take effect as early as next month.

The new 18-cent stamp still will be two cents short of what the Postal Service requested, and may lead the mail agency to ask for another increase next year.

Commission Chairman Lee Fritschler said the rate decision was "anti-inflationary." A dissenting commission member said the new rates will be inadequate to cover Postal Service expenses and agreed another increase is likely before long.

The decision will give the the Postal Service about $1 billion less per year than the $3.75 billion it said it needs. Moreover, President Reagan is proposing cuts in the postal subsidy.

Postmaster General William F. Bolger said last week the agency may need to ask for higher rates again later this year if the rate commission did not approve the full request.

Fritschler told a Senate subcommittee the rate decision included:

—Making the first-class letter rate 18 cents for the first ounce and 17 cents per ounce after that. Post cards will be 12 cents, one penny less than the Postal Service wanted.

Salvadoran left claims U.S. advising military

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador — Leftist leaders charged yesterday that 100 U.S. military advisers are masterminding a counter-insurgency plant to "cut off the head of the leftist and intellectual sectors in El Salvador." The Salvador junta and U.S. Embassy sources denied the accusation.

The Democratic Revolutionary Front, a coalition of leftists who want to set up a Marxist government, said in a communique to news media that the "shameful aid from Washington" had "obliged the junta to turn schools into barracks." The Front said the U.S. attitude should remind the world of "what happened not too many years ago in Vietnam."

Vegas busboy charged

LAS VEGAS, Nev. — A 23-year-old busboy was formally charged with first-degree arson and eight counts of murder yesterday in last week's fire at the Las Vegas Hilton Hotel.

The criminal complaint filed in Clark County Justice Court alleged that Philip Bruce Cline set the fire "willfully unlawfully, maliciously and feloniously," killing eight persons.

The district attorney's office, which filed the charges, thus rejected Cline's alleged confession in which he claimed he touched off the fire accidentally while engaged in a homosexual act near an eighth-floor elevator.

Polish strike to end

WARSAW, Poland — After months of turmoil, Poland was nearly strike free yesterday as farmers in a remote mountain village near the Soviet border were expected to approve an agreement ending the nation's last known labor protest.

A spokesman for the Gdansk headquarters of the independent trade union Solidarity said settlement of farmer protests in southereastern Poland could finally end the nationwide strikes that started in August.

"However, there may be some isolated action of which we know nothing," he said. "But generelly, nothing is happening."

Business Center offers aid to all

By SALLY KERANS
Collegian Correspondent

Psychiatrists, auto—body mechanics, pet store owners, "You name it, we run the gamut," said Gerald W. Hayes, sounding like a Public Relations representative of a new shopping mall.

But in a sense, the Small Business Development Center of which Hayes is Director, is a shopping center one where small businesses can buy management, financial and technical assistance and training, advice, and solutions to the problems which often mean the difference between success and failure for smaller firms which can't afford the price of big—business consultation.

The newest SBDC's are located in Massachusetts, one of them here at the University of Massachusetts in the School of Business Administration Center for Economic Development.

Counseling, Continuing Education and Information and Referral are the programs offered by the Center. A total if nine programs with 235 participants in Western Mass. are to be provided by the Center according to the UMass SBBC First Quarter Report.

The Federal Statute under which the Western Mass. Center was formed is also responsible for the formation of the Metropolitan Boston Regional SBDC, located on the Boston College campus in Newton. ""I'm really pleased that we got the two regional centers in operation as quick as we did," Hayes said. Both Centers became operational a month after plans were final.

Funding for the SBDC is a joint venture between the Massachusetts Dept. of Commerce, which contributed $100,000, The Small Business Administration, with $200,000 investment in the project, and the University contributing $100,000 in "in—kind" services, such as space.

The First Quarter Report states that professionals and "exceptional students" will staff the Center, and Hayes added that students will be taken on as interns working with clients and as research assistants for academic credit.

Liberalism declines in freshman class

By PAUL BASKEN
Collegian Staff

There id a decline in political liberalism among this year's freshmen, according to an annual survey conducted by the Student Affairs Research and Evaluation Office (SAREO).

The survey, based on the responses of 2,795 first year students at the University of Massachusetts, shows 33.7 percent classifying themselves as far left or liberal, compared to 36.8 percent of last year's entering class. The percentage has decreased steadily since 1971, when 55.5 percent described themselves as liberals.

At the same time, the percentage of students identifying themselves as far right or conservative has increased, rising from 8.3 percent nine years ago to 11.4 percent last year, and to 12.9 percent this year.

Also, the percentage of students characterizing themselves as middle-of-the-road increased. Ths year, 53.5 percent termed themselves moderate, up from the 51.8 percent last year, and the 36.2 percent in 1971.

Jerome Mileur, Political Science professor at UMass, said the changes could be attributed to a nationwide decline in interest in politics, as evidenced by the low voter turnout at recent elections.

The same survey conducted at college campuses nationwide by the American Council of Education, questioned freshmen on political and social issues.

The response of UMass freshmen differing the greatest from the national response concerned couples living together before marriage. The idea was agreed with by 62.9 percent of freshmen at UMass, and by 43.4 percent nationally. However, Public universities with high selectivity (average S.A.T. scores of 1100 or higher), including UMass, reported a norm of 45.9 percent agreeing with the idea.

Doug Frost, student research assistant for SAREO, said the classification of UMass may be misleading because S.A.T. scores are not relied on heavily as a basis for admission to UMass.

The response of UMass students showed a similar varience from the national response on the question of approval of sex between people who like each other but may have known each other for a very short time. UMass freshmen were again more favorable, with 80.2 percent of the men and 51.5 percent of the women approving, compared to freshmen nationwide, with 64.6 percent of the men and 32.4 percent of the women agreeing. The norm of freshmen responses at the high selectivity universities, including UMass, showed 68.8 percent of the men and 35.2 percent of the women agreeing.

General Dynamics draws fire

Student protesters march against recruiters

By SALLY KERANS
Collegian Correspondent

About 15 students protesting the presence of General Dynamics, the makers of the Trident nuclear submarine, recruiters yesterday gathered at the ramp of Whitmore Administration Building holding signs and urging students to support world peace.

"We believe that if action is going to be taken to reduce military nuclear arms, that action should be taken at the grassroots, with those who produce arms," said Rick Donohue, 'concerned citizen' and an organizer of the rally.

Todd Clark, another 'concerned citizen' and organizer said, "You think big and you start small; the plan wasn't to amass thousands...It was to inform as many people on campus as possible on military preparedness..."

Clark spoke to gatherers and passersby about the Trident missile and its capacity. "One Trident equals 2040 Hiroshimas...We must think of Hiroshima every second," he said.

Clark said that while the Electric Boat Division of General Dynamics was recruiting students and promoting the proliferation of arms, "...We are gathering to offer alternatives to making the bomb."

A student who wished to remain unidentified said that the rally was built on short notice by no particular group, and that "many people here feel the need for a watchdog committee to be on the lookout for military recruiters."

Siobhan Breen, an ROTC cadet said, "I can see why they'd (protesters) be alarmed. I think it's a good thing they're trying to educate people on the Trident missile."

A spokesman for the director of the Placement Office was not available for comment on the rally.

Clark said after the rally that he was pleased with the turnout. "You just have to do what you think is important," he said.

Defunct theater group re-emerges with grant

The Reister Doisters theater group, a Recognized Student Organization, is attempting to start up again this semester with a $500 grant from the Fine Arts Council.

The Reister Doisters were active on campus in the 1960's and early 70's but disbanded in 1977 due to a loss of interest, said Joel Cotter, stage supervisor in the theater department.

This year the 15—member group is considering producing Peter Schaffer's "White Lies" or Ronald Harwood's "Trouble in the Works. In the past the Reisters Doisters presented one-act plays such as Pinero's "Sir Algernon, The American Dream, "The Zoo Story, and "Private of Second Avenue, he said. Cotter said on choosing the show which will open in mid-April on Bowker Lawrence is heartburn.

"We will be auditioning very soon, said Cotter. "The organization is open to anyone. To become a member you have to participate in the working of a show by performing, working in the box office, committee - or any other part of the organization. The idea is to present professional quality shows while having fun at the same time."

The Reister Doisters are funded by the student's $20 grant and through box office and concessions sales.

NASA budget cuts threaten UM project

A project to invent and study oxygen extraction in extraterrestrial climate that University of Massachusetts faculty and students have been working on for the past 18 months may be threatened by President Reagan's proposed $109 million cut in the space program.

However, Professor R. Eglind Engleman, head of the project, said the program cut may not be as bad as previously feared.

The Specialist Intermediate Oxygen (SINTOX) Project at UMass, for completion in its first phase of investigation and research, is due results to NASA on Feb. 25. NASA will then decide whether to grant the estimated $4.4 million needed to complete the project.

Four UMass professors, two graduate students, and two undergraduates as well as three engineers and a physicist are involved in the project. Only one of the students is involved in the project for credit and if the project can not be completed he should not have trouble switching to something else, Professor Ygvesson said.

If completed, SINTOX project results will be utilized on Spacelab missions to be launched in approximately three and a half years.

Pre-med junior wins W.H. Ross award

A pre-med junior at the University of Massachusetts Reginald Levy of Peabody, received this year's William H. Ross Memorial Scholarship. The scholarship is given each year to an outstanding junior or senior on a competitive basis by a physics department committee. It includes a $1500 award and honors the late William H. Ross, physics professor and distinguished teacher.

Physical plant names employee of the year

The University of Massachusetts Amherst Physical Plant selected Eldred Szymkowicz as employee of the year during a recent awards ceremony. She was selected from a group of 12 candidates who had been selected as employees of the month for November, 1980.

Mrs. Szymkowicz has worked for the University for three and a half years as receptionist.

Police arrest 3 men

Three men were stopped by University of Massachusetts police for breaking into a car parked at 54 Hicks University yesterday morning. The men will receive a show-cause hearing in Hampshire District Court. The men had apparently taken two speakers from the car, police said.

A 1967 Volvo station wagon parked in Dickinson Hall rolled backward down Clark Hill Road Wednesday night. The car hit two trees at the bottom of the hill and sustained damage to the left side and rear of the vehicle.

BLACK AFFAIRS

ATLANTA — Russell Bellamar, Jr., holds a rose Tuesday during a funeral mass at St. Anthony's Catholic Church in Atlanta in memory of his 13-year-old son Patrick who was murdered last week. The single flower was given by Patrick's classmates. Others in photo are unidentified.

Black Senator Now Rep.

BOSTON (AP) — In a carefully staged political extravaganza, disgruntled Democrat Bill Owens, the state's first and only black senator, was welcomed with open arms Thursday into the Republican Party.

The move has been anticipated for weeks ever since Owens quit a championship fight to fill an open seat was first from the Senate Ways and Means Committee.

What made a particularly unique for the liberal Owens was the role played in the administration secretary by noted GOP conservatives, including Sen. David H. Locke, Wolcester, and Rep. Andrew S. Haldane, Hobson, chairman of the party's state committee.

The secretary of public officers chair Owens, 40, has a master's degree from Harvard and is a candidate for a doctorate from UMass-Amherst.

Owens said Democratic legislative leaders, from whom he has been "unanimous" and he thinks he will do more for his constituents as a Republican.

There is no question but, at the moment, he was shown for the Republicans as a senator. What present, he can be the GOP's eighth vote, enough to form a roll call on any issue.

It was a rare and crowded event at the Parker House — some of the old timers could remember anything quite like it — and nearly all the GOP bigwigs were present.

There was a telegram from another former Democrat, President Ronald Reagan, that said, "... glad to have you aboard." There was a similar note of cheer from Rep. Margaret Heckler, R-Mass.

It was "music junior," Sen. John F. Parker of Taunton, the GOP leader said, Republicans found success of the black senatorial district for the 1974 election. Owens, then a freshman representative, won and has been re-elected three times.

At Arrival of the GOP city committee, noted that Jack Reagan and former Sen. Edward W. Brooke had been Democrats. Present was publicHouse County Sheriff John J. Buckley, who started as a Democrat but converted early.

At least three black Democratic representatives attended. Mel King and David Bailey Jr., of Boston and Raymond Jordan of Springfield.

Adding reinforcement that the party change probably would have no impact on the anti-senatorial election.

A Tribute to Black History Month

The black man has been an integral part of American society since 1619 when 20 blacks were brought to Jamestown, Va., as slaves. For the past 361 years, blacks have given their strength, courage, ingenuity and all but about their lives for the nation under which this country was founded.

The black man has contributed greatly to every aspect of American culture. Inventions and discoveries by black people have saved lives and revolutionized industries, yet, in many instances, full credit has not been given.

Among these inventions was a device that allowed communication between moving trains; the first American-made coach; a fire extinguisher; a fire escape ladder; a golf tee, even the potato chip and a host of others which remain an important part of American lifestyle.

Inventions and discoveries by black people have saved lives and revolutionized industries.

Some of the most important discoveries were made by Jan E. Matzeliger, Garrett A. Morgan, William A. Hinton, Daniel Hale Williams and Charles Drew. Matzeliger invented the "lasting machine" in 1883. This machine revolutionized the shoe industry by mechanically attaching the tops of shoes to the soles. This made mass production of shoes possible.

Morgan invented the first electric stop sign which was helpful in relieving confusion at intersections. He also invented the gas mask which was used during WWI. I just finding out that o'clock man made the gas mask, southern retailer refused to market the product.

The Hinton Test for syphilis was discovered by Dr. Hinton. The test is still used today.

The first successful open heart surgery was performed in 1893 by Dr. Daniel Hale Williams.

An important, yet lesser, discovery was made by Charles Drew. Drew was a pioneer in the research of blood plasma. His study is possible to store human blood for use at a later time. This discovery was used during WWII for wounded Allied troops. Although he was directly responsible for the start of the blood bank, Drew died on the steps of a southern hospital because they refused to give a black man a transfusion.

Blacks also helped to build the country in other, equally important ways. In 1890, Christopher Columbus was accompanied by Pedro Alonso Nino, a black explorer and pilot.

Not only did the black man take part in the discovery of America, but he also was a hero in freeing it from British domination. Lemuel Haynes served as a Minuteman in Connecticut in 1765. Jack Sisson assisted in the capture of the British commander in chief, Major General Richard Prescott in 1777. During the revolution, 5,000 blacks fought for the Patriot cause. Among them was a runaway slave Crispus Attucks, the first man to die in the name of American independence in 1770. Blacks have fought and died for America since the revolution and for two hundred years, have received honors of recognition.

The names of great athletes and artists such as Muhammad Ali, Henry Aaron, Jackie Robinson, Willie Mayfield, Paul Robeson, Sidney Poitier, Hank Davis, Marian Anderson and Lena Horne are easily recognizable. Yet, why is it then that few blacks are noted for their achievements other than in the field of entertainment? Why is it that the black man has sometimes been downgraded by many as a human being?

Those men who argued the plight of the black man were Frederick Douglass, an ex-slave, William Edward Burghardt DuBois, a scholar, and Martin Luther King, Jr., a minister in a small southern church. Each of these men, in his respective time, called upon all races in order to rid the abnormality of the inequalities that blacks were forced to endure. No such man was able to accomplish only a little more than his predecessor.

King achieved the most in his 13 years of fighting for equality. He would not doubt have continued to fight had his life not been cut short by an assassin's bullet.

The history of blacks in America is an important part of the American history around which a movement and the denial of black history would be a gross misrepresentation of American history. Carter G. Woodson, a renowned black historian, sought to rectify the inadequacy by initiating Negro History Week in 1926. This week began on February 12 and ended on the twentieth, to more and more achievements by blacks were uncovered. Negro history week was expanded to a month.

The month of February is devoted to Black History nationwide. It gives proper recognition to black achievers of the past, stimulates those striving today, and serves as a model for the future. The information gained on during black history month is valuable to Americans of all races and creeds, if we are to live, work and grow together.

INTERESTING PEOPLE

'Altered States' is unrealistic

Student describes isolation tank

By ED LEVINE
Collegian Staff

The recent release and popularity of the movie "Altered States" has many people across the country wondering about the isolation tank, the main device portrayed in the film, but at least one University of Massachusetts student already knows all about them.

Rob Thayer, a junior BDIC major from Boston, said he has used isolation tanks about 40 times since he first tried them in the beginning of 1977. The tank, Thayer said, is a small metal enclosure in which a person lies in salt-saturated water, totally deprived of light, sound, or feeling. The result, he said, is a feeling of total relaxation.

"There's no physical exertion required. It's absolute relaxation. And when the body relaxes, the mind relaxes," Thayer said. "Because it's so quiet and dark and free from external distractions, it is conducive to experiencing things yourself."

Thayer compares the experience of an isolation tank to a deep state of meditation, where the body relaxes and allows the mind to go free. But, he said, it is different from experiencing a drug-induced "trip" or anything designed to be escapist.

"It's not escapist, it's totally opposite. Anyone looking for an escape had better not go in the tank," Thayer said, adding that people tend to come "face to face with themselves" in the tank.

In the fictional film "Altered States," the main character, a physiology professor at Harvard Medical School, enters an isolation tank and has hallucinatory experiences. Later in the film, the scientist takes an hallucinogenic drug while in the tank and experiences altered states of consciousness far beyond his, or anyone else's, imagination.

Thayer said he enjoyed the film as "good science fiction," but found it very unrealistic.

"It (the film) has very little to do with isolation tanks as I know them," Thayer said. "I have reservations. I'm afraid (the film) may alienate people from altered states because they're made out to be frightening and dangerous when, in fact, we experience altered states daily and they're readily available to all of us—sleeping, dreaming, day-dreaming, and many drug-induced states."

Thayer said he feels that although the film may generate people's interest in isolation tanks, it may also produce fear of them.

"It's just going to add to the whole aura of strangeness and craziness surrounding the tank now, when in fact it's just a tank of water," he said.

Thayer also said he knows of no one who has combined the tank experience with hallucinogenic drugs and experienced anything unusual.

"The effects are dependent upon the state and expectations of the individual. Your expectations play a strong role in what you experience. The more imaginative types might experience hallucinations," he said.

Thayer described the tank as being the shape of a "mini-igloo," about eight feet across with a circular base. The three-foot

Still Life with Woodpecker (Bantam)
By Tom Robbins

By DONALD J. IVAS
Collegian Correspondent

Someone once said "T.R. writes like Dolly Parton looks." There is no way I'm going to explain that one to you, but I will tell you that Tom Robbins' writing is as easy to take as a candygram. His off-the-wall satirre is a mental message and the accolades could go on and on.

If you have a sense of wonder, Still Life with Woodpecker will fulfill it. This brilliant satirist places you gently on the fringe of his zany world with the likes of outlaws, princes, has-been kings, and misplaced macrobiotic red-headed princesses. These are not characters, though, for Robbins brings these people into your heart and mind, people you can feel, people you already know somehow. Expect the unexpected in Woodpecker. Robbins' style and humor are natural, they draw you in and soothe like a warm bath.

In Woodpecker, as in his other novels, Even Cowgirls Get the Blues and Another Roadside Attraction, Robbins demonstrates his ability to laugh through his writing simply because he is having fun.

Through this fun he gibes at some very real issuestsexism, racism, classism) and topples down institutionalized dogma with a tap of his Remington. The Catholic Church, big business, government, law enforcement, and status quo are all targets of Robbins' satire. Yet he feeds us this satire like you would feed aspirin to a dog - all mashed up in chocolate ice cream - you don't know it's there but you feel better after you read it.

The art work on the cover of Woodpecker might lead one to believe the book is connected with the dangers of smoking Camel cigarettes or is for members of the Audubon Society. It is neither.

Woodpecker is a mad but lovable bomber, a remnant of the sixties that just so happens to team up with a 20th century red-headed princess. Together they flirt with the moon, search for the answer to pyramid power, and attempt to answer the ultimate question: how does one make love stay? If this leaves you scratching your head,

Dorson creates a wonderful 'Folktale' anthology

Folktales Told Around the World
(University of Chicago Press)
By Richard M. Dorson

By BETH SEGERS
Collegian Staff

Folktales Told Around the World, an anthology of folk tales, legends, and jokes from 44 countries around the globe, is a new approach to the art of storytelling. Combining a complete text of tales (their origins, various forms, etc.), photographs of storytellers in their native act, and an index of tale types, the book is both a historical narrative and an interesting book to glance through occasionally for fun.

Dorson's introduction points to the difference between his anthology and previous collections such as Aesop's and the Grimms' fairy tales. "Somehow the public must be persuaded that a book of folktales should contain information about the stories, that the stories by themselves are virtually worthless and valueless without commentaries."

Not only does Dorson give full explanation of origins and types of tales before the text, but he also stresses new tales which have not yet been told. He attacks the practice of other anthologists who repeat familiar stories saying "because anthologists draw from collections that themselves draw from previous publications, the printed folktale goes even farther from an original word-of-mouth delivery."

Dorson's collection ranges from three-paragraph jokes to complex thirty-page stories, each from a different country. Tales are often meant to teach a lesson of manners or morality but also include humorous little anecdotes with no motive other than reader and listener enjoyment.

Particular selections of interest from the book include "The Cruel Mother-In-Law" (Iraq), "The King of England" (Scotland), "Why People's Noses Run When They Catch Cold" (Korea), "How the Society Can Get Back Its Medicine" (Liberia), and "The Two Thieves With The Same Wife" (Afghanistan). While admittedly this is not a book to be read in one sitting, the anthology is great to pick up for a half-hour before drifting off to sleep.

Blue Wall back in action this weekend

DAVID WILDMAN
Collegian Staff

The Blue Wall is swinging back into action with some great music for this upcoming weekend.

Performing tomorrow night will be the Shaboo All Stars, featuring "guitar Matt Murphy" of Blues Brothers fame.

Saturday night features The Trademarks, a fine New Wave act from Boston. The Trademarks are adept at writing catchy, danceable songs, and also have an amazing arsenal of British Invasion covers, all rendered impeccably. These guys are liable to pull out all the stops on Saturday, so this is a must show.

Admission for both performances is $2.00. Eighteen and nineteen year olds will be admitted but are not allowed to drink.

MassPIRG angered at waste oil violations

BOSTON (AP) — A consumer group charged yesterday that tas stations and other motor oil retailers are violating the law and increasing hazardous waste problems by telling customers to dump waste oil down the sewer or in the garbage or backyard.

The Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group, releasing results of a survey, said retailers and state agencies "have failed to meet their responsibilities under state laws to prevent widespread dumping of hazardous waste oils in the environment."

Rather than force compliance by such oil retailers as department and grocery stores, the group is pushing legislation that would require service stations to collect used oil from anyone who shows up with two gallons or less.

Most service stations already have waste oil retention facilities, MassPIRG said, and the incentive to open them to anyone is that they can sell used oil for recycling at 10 to 15 cents per gallon

Frothing at the mouth? This dorm wants you!

By RICHARD NAGLE
Collegian Staff

Some University of Massachusetts students are planning a contest to see who can froth at the mouth the most.

The Bizarre Entertainment Committee of Grayson Dormitory in Orchard Hill Residential Area last week decided the best way to instill spirit in the dorm's 320 residents would be to hold a toothbrush frothing contest.

Grayson House Council President Sandy Chaprick, a 20-year-old junior psychology major from Beverly, said the rules for the three day contest are simply to froth, "as much as you can get in your mouth."

On Monday through Wednesday, each of the 12 corridors on the dorm will hold a frothing contest in the hall's bathroom.

With brush in hand and paste in mouth, contestants will be judged based on how much froth or foam they can produce.

The winner from each corridor will go on to compete in the dorm-wide "frothoff," Chaprick said.

The winner of the frotheff will receive a box of dental floss, he said.

Bizarre Entertainment Committee Chairman Sarir Khamsi, a 21-yer-old junior electrical engineering major from Westboro, said he came up with the idea from a similar contest held on his floor last semester.

"At first I was just kidding around. I used to kid people when they were brushing their teeth because they are really self-conscious about foam," Khamsi said.

Khamsi said he knew of no special combination of pastes that would give a contestant a winning edge but said a woman in last year's contest made her own blend that made "pounds of foam."

"It's talent too. There's technique, brush strokes, etcetera," Khamsi said.

★Folktales

Dorson is careful to explain the various types of tales which are included in his book. As he notes "Frequently the term 'Folktale' is opposed to the term 'legend,' to differentiate between a fiction and a happening. A joke, if it is told often enough to endure, becomes a folktale, although jokes seem somehow a little disreputable to keep company with Aesop and Grimm."

American folktales are unique in that they are a combination of "European mother tongues with American English which produce hybrid narratives."

Dorson's collection is a very enjoyable one for myself and all other amateur folktale readers because of its diversity in subject, origin, and style, and also because he explains how the tales were selected. More knowledgeable readers of this literary form should also be impressed by his unique collection and content.

high fiberglass tank is filled with 18 inches of water heated to body temperature and saturated with 800 pounds of Epsom salts to provide buoyancy. He said people lay on their backs in the tank which is totally sound and light-proof.

"You can't even see your hand two inches in front of your face," Thayer said.

Thayer said he uses a tank owned by a friend in Allston, a Boston neighborhood, who used the tank as part of his doctoral thesis in psychology. He said he knows of 10 tanks in the Boston area, and two facilities available for public use for a fee. He said he is not aware of any tanks in Western Massachusetts.

Thayer said using the tank has helped him relax and work out problems and many people should take advantage of such a device.

"In this society, we are so far removed from what we feel and experience internally that we got out of touch with what is mysterious and unknown," Thayer said. "People have a fear and awe of the unknown. The tank kind of symbolizes that."

Consumer ripoffs

Last year my mother's iron blew up. My father sympathized, and bought her a new Super-Duper steam and surge iron, guaranteed to flatten clothes in mere minutes. My mother was transported with glee. "Look, there's even a five dollar rebate!" she said, and filled out the card and mailed it before she even tried the iron.

A few weeks later, she received a mimeographed note with ten little boxes denoting ten possible reasons why the company thought best not to return to rebate. One of the boxes had an X in it, after which were the famous words: "Super-Duper can not honor two requests for rebates from the same address."

I happened to be home at the time. I remember two rebates that I had sent for to various companies, and I received the same type of letter in return. It was beginning to dawn on me that Super-Duper was giving somebody the Super-Dupe. After all, the rebate was for the product and not the address, so that even if my father chose to buy six irons, all six rebates ought to be returned for the thirty dollars excess given to the company, no?

At a New Year's party, I met a guy named Bill who works in the State Attorney General's office, investigating consumer problems. The rebate thing was fresh on my mind, and when I asked Bill about it, he said that his office never got any complaints on rebates to speak of. I let this sad news seethe inside me for a day or so, until I decided to take the law into my own hands. I was nearly foaming at the mouth by the time I found my mother's rebate refusal. On the bottom of the mimeographed sheet I penned: "Dear Bastards: How the hell many irons do you think we buy? The rebate is expected forthwith. S.M."

As fate has it, the swindlers never sent the five bucks. Thus, instead of saving three dollars by not buying the Merely-Deluxe teflon iron, my parents lost an additional two dollars by buying what they were content not believing was on sale.

So what's the use of rebates anyway? you might ask. Originally, rebates were designed to offset both the company and the consumer a break. For example, a company pulls in ten thousand dollars in a day from a certain product. One-thousand dollars of that is to be returned to customers who send in their cards. Essentially, this means that the surplus money gains interest for the company while waiting to be rebated to certain card bids. Customers who never return their cards help the company further. The customers who do return their cards get their couple of dollars back, so they're happy (even though they never see any interest).

Now here's where it gets complicated. The company prints up sheets that refuse multiple requests, to protect against customers who open ten boxes of certain goods and try to rip off not only the company but also their fellow customers. Even though a sales slip is usually required to accompany the rebate request, these cheating customers can easily doctor the order by supplying [illegible] from any department store. I would suppose that companies began to send refusal sheets at random, whenever such repeat orders were suspect. How it got to be a corporate habit, I don't begin to guess.

It is a sensational little trick, though—this refusal of rebate. Tough to prove, small-time swindle of semi-conscious consumers, quick boost to the profit margin, more liquid cash for investment growth.

What do we do? We could boycott all products that have a mail-in rebate, for if the company really wants us to save five dollars on their product, they can reduce the price at the counter and save the Post Office the unnecessary hassles. But this may hurt companies who offer legitimate rebates (if there are any).

Or we could fight the individual thieving companies who regularly swindle the public, by quarterly notifying the attorney general's office about the company and the amount refused, even if it's only a half dollar. Documentation in the form of refused rebate would help to launch an investigation.

The most important thing to understand about rebates is that it's your money in the company's hands. The company isn't going to lose out on a rebate offer. If you don't fight it, the swindle will continue. So file your slips today, keep your eyes open.

Provocation and slander

Provocation and slander have reared their ugly heads in our midst!

The Western Massachusetts Latin America Solidarity Committee (WMLASC) finds it necessary to report to the University community that an irresponsible act has been directed against our activities here on campus. WMLASC, mindful of our responsibilities to the larger community, seek to ensure that such an act is not repeated, not only against our own work but also against that of other organizations at UMass.

[illegible] on many possible motives behind this act. It may have been carried out by a terrorist individual who actually believes in the genocidal bombing of Nicaragua, perhaps this was the work of a group that wants to intimidate WMLASC and confuse the general public. For the moment, the actual motives are unknown. What is quite clear, however, is the malicious intent of the individuals or group involved, demonstrated by the nature of the altered poster as was designed to appear as the original poster and was anonymously displayed.

What effects does this incident have on our work? Not [illegible] to say that, at present, our response is the following: The members of WMLASC will not be intimidated, we will not allow this act to divide us, nor will we censor our campaign [illegible] to investigate the origins of the poster. Rather, we take this as an opportunity to recommit ourselves to our solidarity work with the peoples of Latin America.

It is important that such an incident not be repeated in our midst. For that, we must all take responsibility—by condemning such acts when they do occur and by acting responsibly and resolutely to prevent any further occurrences.

Put your writing talent to use

In response to your article, "Quasi-Sports, Alternative Athletics" (2/18), you managed to describe yourself to a tee, Mr. Freker—good job. You stated, "One of the most popular sports on campus probably retains it's wide appeal because you don't have to be in any kind of shape, physically or mentally, to participate. All you need in this competition is a loud voice, a reasonably good imagination, and a well developed exaggerative quality to your descriptions of people."

Your voice is louder than all because you talk through the press, you have an extremely good imagination, you have a very well developed exaggerative quality, and I don't appreciate people like you one bit. It's comments like yours about waiting for the bus, slithering into class, and especially those stupid remarks about dining on campus, that are the true exaggerations.

It's exactly these kind of slanders against my school that really irritate me because I'm here getting one of the finest educations available anywhere (Chem. E.) and I'm sick of hearing "ZOO MASS."

It's exactly your kind of "ink" that builds that reputation. Why don't you put your writing talent in a good direction?!

U.S. Environmental Center calls 1980 'a very bad year'

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The weather claimed more than 1,400 American lives and cost the nation well over $20 billion in 1980, a year dominated by a heat wave and drought, the government reported yesterday.

"Because of the summer drought, it certainly has been a very bad year," said Malcolm Reid of the Center for Environmental Assessment Services.

In addition to the drought, the 1980 climate impact assesment detailed other disasters including the eruption of Mount St. Helens, blizzards, wind and rainstorms and severe tornado outbreaks.

The drought and associated heat wave affected 42 states and killed 1,318. Many of the victims were old or poor, living in non-air conditioned apartments and homes, the report said.

Losses, primarily in agriculture, were estimated at $19.3 billion.

The heat led to a billion bushel decrease in the soybean crop, damage up to 90 percent of the spring wheat crop over large areas, slowed livestock growth and the loss of cover leading to increased soil erosion, the report said. Milk and hay production were also down sharply in some areas and water levels dropped dangerously low.

"There is only one instance in the last few years that was anything even approaching this; that was the severe winter of 1976-77 when industries had to close down and there was a drop in the gross national product for the winter quarter," said Reid.

Actual comparative statistics for prior years are not readily available, because 1980 was the first year for the climate impact assessment program.

In addition, the heat led to widespread buckling and melting of roads, drinking water became scarce in some parts of the country, power consumption jumped due to use of air conditioners and irrigation equipment, forest fires destroyed large areas of timberland and governments had to spend billions in disaster assistance for affected areas.

Flood scenes like this one in Port Jervis, N.Y., were common in 1980, as the year's harsh weather took over 1,400 lives. AP Laserphoto

Court says towns must pay private schools for services

BOSTON (AP) — The state Supreme Court ruled yesterday that communities may purchase special education contracts for students outside their public school systems without violating the state constitution's anti-aid amendment.

The 27-page decision by Justice Francis J. Quiroco found that the Springfield School Committee erred in claiming it could not purchase services privately for severely handicapped children.

The court said that contracts for special education services "are not made 'for the purpose of founding, maintaining or aiding' such schools."

In a related development in the Essex Superior Court, Judge Samuel Adams ruled that Essex — which has no high school — must provide transportation for residents attending private schools in nearby towns to the same extent that it transports 36 Essex residents attending Gloucester High.

Foster H. Ball, Essex school superintendent, said the decision will cost the town an estimated $50,000 busing 36 Essex residents to St. John's Prep in Danvers and Bishop Fenwick School in Peabody.

During the five years the Springfield suit has been pending, the city has supported programs for the approximately 141 special needs children affected by the dispute, according to Terry Zoulas, spokesman for the state Education Department.

An additional 3,168 pupils participate in "Chapter 766" special education programs within the Springfield schools. The litigation only concerned services for children who could not be educated within the public system.

According to Zoulas some of the residential programs for severely handicapped children can cost $20,000 or more a year.

The state Board of Education and Commissioner Gregory R. Anrig filed the complaint against the city. Defendants were the school committee members and Mayor Theodore E. Dimauro, presiding officer.

In a previous ruling involving Springfield, the court held that the anti-aid amendment prohibited the distribution of textbooks to non public schools. The 1917 constitutional provision bars spending public money in non-public schools.

The Springfield officials determined that it also applied to purchasing educational services from non-public schools, although authorized by Chapter 766.

The court disagreed. "We find no hidden legislative purpose to aid or maintain private schools," it said, adding: "The statute's purpose is, primarily, to help specified children with special needs obtain the education that is theirs by right."

State bill would ban TCE

BOSTON (AP) — A proposal to temporarily ban the use of asbestos cement and vinyl containing TCE for water pipes in Massachusetts has won support from a Martha's Vineyard group. However, a spokesman for pipe manufacturers says it's premature for the state to intervene.

The legislature's Natural Resources Committee heard testimony yesterday on a bill that would impose a two-year ban on the materials while a task force studies their alleged health hazards.

Cynthia Meisner, a member of the Pure Water Alliance of Martha's Vineyard, said she was frustrated by the state's seeming lack of urgency in dealing with the issue. She said she had no idea there might be a problem until a policeman came to her home one day and told her the drinking water was contaminated.

Nancy Goodwin of Edgartown said she feared that the water she had been drinking could cause birth defects. She said she now drinks only bottled water but still has to pay a municipal water bill.

Joseph Jackson, president of the Asbestos Pipe Association, said there was no conclusive evidence on the dangers of asbestos in pipes. In fact, he said, a National Cancer Institute study in Connecticut found a lower cancer mortality rate in areas were asbestos piping was used.

Coalition attacks Welfare Dept.

BOSTON (AP) — The state's effort to uncover welfare recipients secretly holding jobs is a waste of money, an advocacy group charged yesterday.

The Coalition of Basic Human Needs held a Statehouse news conference to attack the Welfare Department's "computer matching" program. The matching, begun in 1979, compares computer rosters of welfare recipients against lists of persons who are paying state withholding taxes or Social Security. When the same person is found on both lists, an investigation is begun to see whether the person should have aid reduced or cancelled.

"Governor King has not only been harassing welfare recipients but he's also been lying to the taxpaying public," said Sheril Twine, coalition spokeswoman. "...None of his 'cost savings' measures have saved any money at all."

A Coalition analysis, prepared with the help of Massachusetts Community Action, challenged administration claims that three rounds of computer matches have pared welfare costs by $10 million to $11 million. It claimed that the first round actually cost the state a net $1.1 million and the second and third rounds saved only $970,000.

The state's total welfare program, including Medicaid, is running about $1.7 billion a year. The federal government picks up about half the cost.

The coalition said the administration's figures were faulty because they assumed that people caught by computer matches would be off welfare for at least a year. In most cases, the people are back on welfare rolls within three months, the advocates said.

UMass wins ACU-I tourney

Six first places help acquire cup

By NANCY PARKS
Collegian Staff

With over 300 participants from universities all over New England, the University of Massachusetts intramural program won the overall cup in the annual association of College Unions-International Recreation Tournament for Region 1. Competition ranged from billiards to college bowl, in this past weekend's tourney held at UMass.

With UMass entered in only half of the events, it was a surprise and delight to win the overall cup for the tourney.

UMass took first place in six events: men's team bowling, with members Herbert Banacker, William Christiansen, Jeffrey Bechter, James Stecvick, Robert Levey, and James Tubbs; women's team bowling, members Christina Hoyt, Deborah Cushing, Susan Wong, Liz Skelton, Debbie Roelofs, and Anne Turusky; men's all-event bowl, with Bob Levey; chess team, with Christopher Chase and Joseph Farg; men's billiards with Cory Margolis; and table tennis men's double, with Oliver Newell and Steve Marcoux.

Second place teams were women's all event bowl, with Susan Wong and women's high single, also with Wong.

Oliver Newell got third place in the men's single table tennis.

The ACU was formed in 1953 and has been going strong ever since. The idea for such a tournament, according to Gary Cilley, was thought up by some inventive people as a possible alternative to intercollegiate and intramural sports. It is not often that one finds a college or university that has sports teams for chess, darts, backgammon, etc.

As an alternative to the problem this tournament was formed for division I schools in the New England, Canada, and England. Students from schools from these three countries get to show their stuff in their specialty by competing in this tournament in regional and national competitions.

Recognition for this tourney has been steadily building over the years as individuals have been able to strut their stuff in games that were once thought of only as hobbies. In the billiards tourney itself, students from over 20 schools were involved.

The tournament began Saturday morning at 10:00 and ended Sunday evening following an awards banquet. All major events were held in the Campus Center.

Saturday and Sunday saw regional action with national tourneys to follow sometime later in the year. Table tennis and bowling have already been determined to be held in Minnesota and Memphis, respectively.

See the Matmen (2nd in New England) battle URI (1st in NE) tomorrow at 1 p.m. at Boyden.

Former BC basketball players cooperating

BOSTON (AP) — Federal authorities investigating alleged point-shaving by former Boston College basketball players are more interested in convicting two reputed crime figures than the players, according to a published report Thursday.

The Boston Globe also said the players — Ernie Cobb, Rick Kuhn and Jim Sweeney — have appeared before a special grand jury in New York. The paper said Sweeney has agreed to cooperate with authorities. Cobb is expected to cooperate, and Kuhn has not agreed to cooperate.

The investigation stems from allegations that Boston College players were paid to shave points in nine games during the 1978-79 season so that people who bet on the Eagles' opponents would win.

In a recent article in Sports Illustrated, convicted felon Henry Hill said Cobb, Kuhn and Sweeney were involved in alleged point-shaving. Hill also named Peter Vario and Jimmy Burke as "the money" behind the scheme, the Globe said.

"Federal authorities are not much interested in convicting Sweeney, Cobb and Kuhn," the Globe said. "Their interest lies in the convictions of Peter Vario and Jimmy Burke — reputed crime figures in one of New York's largest families."

"We don't want the kids above all," the Globe quoted a Justice Department source. "It's Burke and Vario. If they can be convicted of point shaving, terrific. You take whatever you can get."

Michael Corio, Burke's lawyer, was quoted by the Globe as saying "Jimmy Burke is not involved....All Henry Hill knows how to do is tell Henry Hill stories."

The newspaper said Judith Wicks, now in the Federal Witness Prosection program, is expected to corroborate Hill's statements, and the Brooklyn Organized Crime Strike Force, which is handling the case, is counting on her testimony.

good, because the rest of Woodpecker will leave you searching for more.

This book is an invitation to enter the eye of a comic hurricane that offers an amusing diversion and solace. It is difficult to neglect a book that is crammed with simple yet livable tidbits of advice, one of them being "it is never too late to have a happy childhood."

Tom Robbins lives and writes in rainy Seattle, and uses the Northwest as background for fragments of his novels. Still Life with Woodpecker takes off from the Northwest, and touches down in Hawaii, Egypt, and Saudi Arabia. It is a ride well worth taking.

SoConn defeats gymmen

By ELIZABETH McGOWAN
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team scored a season high total of points on Wednesday night, but it was not enough to beat Southern Connecticut State College, who handed the UMass gymmen their second consecutive defeat, 261.10-252.75. UMass now has an overall record of 6-2.

The meet started well for the Minutemen. After the floor exercise, the first event, they held a one point lead over Southern Connecticut.

UMass coach, Roy Johnson, was pleased with his team's performance, especially in the floor exercises.

"Senior Steve Craig and all around competitor, Mark Flanagan, both threw their first double backs in competition," Both men gave impressive performances, scoring 9.15 and 9.10 respectively. Bob Lamb garnered a score of 9.05, good enough for a second place finish for UMass.

Although UMass lost the pommel horse competition, an 11.00.00, they still held a 0.20 point margin over Southern Connecticut when the event was completed. Tim Barry's 8.35 gave him a second place finish while teammate Pete O'Neal placed fourth with an 8.05.

"Last year Southern Connecticut beat us by about 20 points and our objective this meet was to keep the score within 10 points," Johnson said. "There was even the possibility of beating Connecticut if we had performed better as a team," he added.

Southern Connecticut dominated the still ring competition, sweeping the first four places. However, John McGonagle turned in his usual strong performances for UMass, taking fifth place with a score of 8.95.

UMass competitors had some strong performances in the long-horse vaulting competition. Although they lost the event by 0.65 of a point, three UMass gymnasts placed in the top six. Steve Craig finished second in the event with a 9.65 while teammates Lamb and senior co-captain Hugh O'Neall placed fourth and sixth with vaults of 9.50 and 9.40.

The Minutemen did not perform well on the parallel bars, losing the event 41.20-37.55. One bright spot for UMass was Bob Gauthier's first place finish. Gauthier, a freshman, tied his personal season high with a score of 8.80.

Junior John Nelson, had a first place finish in the high bar competition, turning in a 9.10. Teammate Lamb and Hugh O'Neall tied third and fifth place finishes on the bar, but Southern Connecticut also won the event.

Freshman all-around competitor, Bart Mathiesen, showed improvement in two events. He had personal high performances in the floor exercises (8.55) and the pommel horse (8.00). "I was pleased with my performance and thought the team performed well against some tough competitors," Mathiesen said.

Gauthier had the highest all around score of the day for the gymmen, finishing third with a score of 46.45.

The Minutemen will travel to East Stroudsburg this Saturday for a 7 p.m. meet.

Put quite simply, visiting teams hate the Cage.

"I don't care what you say about the Cage, it is intimidating," says Wilson, who has seen ten seasons here as assistant and, for the last two years, as head coach. "It is a place where the crowd can actually change the outcome of a game."

Wilson is not blind to reality. He knows his young team still must learn to play with greater consistency, to play with more cohesiveness as a unit, but he also saw something more in Wednesday night's game.

"I was happy to see that they (the team) also thought they could win a game," Wilson said. "You could see it in the way they played. With this team, confidence becomes a critical factor—especially as we look to the future."

What stands out, more than any other image of Wednesday night, came at the game's end. When the buzzer sounded, the crowd, albeit small, was still there. They hadn't left early. They saw it through.

And, then, the unimaginable happened.

As UMass filed off, clusters of fans stood and applauded. That may seem trivial, but don't underestimate the ramifications of this last point. For the first time in more than three years, a UMass crowd was actually cheering its team, with genuine emotion. It may be the first step back for a program that has been dead for three seasons.

And you knew, that somewhere, somehow, a man named Eldridge was watching it all with a smile.

The Cage comes back to life

To fully appreciate what happened Wednesday night at Curry Hicks Cage you had to, as the saying goes, be there.

The skeptic will say it was just another loss, the 15th this season for the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team.

But, it was more than that. It was a night.

It has become commonplace, if not boring, to dump on the men's program here at UMass in recent years. Last year's 13-14 record, preceded by a 5-22 mark in 1979, and this year's squishy dismal 3-20 has made UMass the whipping boy in New England Div. I basketball. The question on campus in recent years has been not whether the team lost, but by how much.

So, if you are one of these skeptics, they lost by five the other night, 61-56, to Boston University.

But, if you've followed this team, if you've sat through the frustration of close losses, if you've watched the humiliation, or if you were one of the 561 at the Cage the other night, you understand what happened.

It was a night.

UMass lost again, their eleventh straight, but not before they scared the hell out of Boston University in second half surge to bring the Cage crowd to its feet—a crowd that had for forward since the days of Eldridge, Calloway and Pyatt. A crowd that screamed itself hoarse at every Edwin Jones block, every Tony DePina steal, every Craig Smith jumper.

It was Hollywood stuff, a throwback to the days when UMass basketball was competitive, when you lined up outside the Cage an hour before game time just to get in and, when a Cage crowd could scream and cheer and yell and turn a basketball game around, when the mythical homecourt advantage became a reality.

"The enthusiasm of the crowd got the team to play with a genuine intensity, with that same kind of enthusiasm," UMass head coach Ray Wilson said yesterday. "The kids played hard, and the crowd was able to get us back into the game."

It was almost amusing to see students sitting in the endless bleachers standing and waving their arms and jackets in an effort to distract BU players at the free throw line. It's those yards, this has been unfortunate at UMass.

It was more than amusing to see girls dancing with joy—actually face turned into the court stuff—after Tyrone Whitehead brought UMass to within two, 54-53, before tossing in the last seconds.

And it was nothing short of entertaining to hear how much noise such a small crowd could actually make.

"I didn't even think there were that many people there," Wilson said when informed the attendance was listed at 561. "And I'll tell you, I'll never know how they could make that much noise. It reminded me the old days."

The old days, indeed. What happened Wednesday night was exactly what happened for years at the Cage. Visiting teams would come in to a dilapidated building, a building with small, cramped, uncomfortable quarters for locker rooms. Teams would warm up while listening to the taunts of a UMass partisan crowd literally in. And, then, visiting teams would find themselves in a basketball game on a floor with several deadspots—spots where the ball would run because both up to your hand when you dribbled it—with a deafening crowd that arranged all night.

Swimmers lose to Lord Jeffs, 63-50

By ANNA ROELL
Collegian Staff

"Happy news for us, unhappy for you." That's what Hank Dunbar, Amherst College swim coach said after they defeated UMass in the last dual event of the season, 63-50.

The 17 men swim team of Amherst College was let out of Lorentz in their home pool last night. "It was still pretty close, considering," said Brian Spellman of the UMass swimmers.

UMass swept through both diving events of required and optional dives on the one meter springboard. John McCurdy again took first in the five required dives with 108.25 points and senior Stan Anthony finished second behind him. Anthony won the optional diving event of six dives with a total of 242 points. Anthony had hurt his shoulder in practice the day before and hurt his toe during competition doing a reverse one-and-a-half dive, but kept on fighting to finish first.

The first event UMass won and set a pool record for Amherst College. In the 400 free relay, the four men, UMass assistant Steven Samuels, Christopher Furse, Thomas Durkin, and Spellman finished with a final time of 3:16.6. "I knew the divers and the relays would be tough," Dunbar said.

Amherst College hopes to end its season 8-2 after their meet Saturday against Trinity, a weaker team. "That's our best record in ten years," and, said Dunbar, "our best meet this year."

The Lord Jeffs were tired after five tough meets in the past nine days, including a double-header last week and Dunbar said "I'm amazed at how well they did, and I just didn't know how they'd perform."

New Englands are coming up in two weeks on March 5, 6, and 7 at Springfield College. Both teams have been preparing all season for the big competition. UMass will be taking 16-20 swimmers and Amherst College will take 17-18 men. "We've always just been priming for the New England's," UMass coach Russell Yarworth said. "New England's we're ready for."

One UMass swimmer, Mickey Minnich, did his best time of the season, doing a 2:04.5 in the 200 butterfly and placing second. "UMass has been working some quality work, we're ready to taper off," Yarworth said. They have a little over two weeks now to shape up on as much energy as they can muster and then let loose at Springfield College to show New England just who UMass really is.

UMass' 118 pound wrestler Mike Carroll laughs with an opponent in a meet earlier this year. The Mass Wrestlers (12-3-2) will be hosting the number one team in New England—the University of Rhode Island tomorrow at 1 p.m. at the Cage. The Rams won the team championship in last year's Eastern. It is the last meet of the season for the Minutemen, and next weekend they travel to Boston University where nationwide will be competing. Bill McQuaide and John Alfieri will be defending their titles in the New Englands.

UM in ski championships

By ANTONY KUNDERT
Collegian Staff

The UMass men's ski team will travel to Waterville Valley N.H. tomorrow to compete in the New England Intercollegiate Ski Conference Championships. The top four teams in the Colonial league (UMass, Plymouth State College, Boston College, and Amherst) and the best four teams in the Evergreen league (Dartmouth College, Boston University, University of Vermont, St. Anselm) will participate.

Two races will make up the championships, a slalom will be the first event followed by a giant slalom race. Each team will have a six man squad and the best four times will count for the team.

Leading the UMass team will be co-captains Brian Fraida and Rob Gropp. They finished one and two in the overall league standings this year (points are awarded by alternate, nine-to-one ratio). Gropp, a five foot eleven, 170lber from Plymouth, is a two time winner of the Evergreen league (Dartmouth College, Boston University, University of Vermont, St. Anselmes

Afghanistan no longer high priority

By BARRY SCHWEID
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Whatever happened to potentially "the most serious threat to peace since the second world war?"

That is what Jimmy Carter called the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan in the former president's State of the Union message to Congress in January 1980.

Now, 14 months after 85,000 Russian troops rolled into the country, the war in Afghanistan is off the front pages. The few lingering diplomatic initiatives to end the fighting are attracting little attention or interest.

The Soviets are dug in for the long haul. They now have 85,000 soldiers in Afghanistan, but are unable to overcome Afghan resistance. They give no indication of leaving, and the United States has not found a way to reverse the situation.

The Soviet occupation of Afghanistan and the fall in early 1979 of a friendly government in Iran have had a major impact on U.S. military strategy.

The Pentagon got to work on setting up a rapid deployment force to be rushed on short notice to crisis areas and seven ships loaded with equipment, food and ammunition were sent to the Indian Ocean.

The Carter administration quietly abandoned its idea of neutralizing the ocean region in negotiations with the Soviets. The Reagan administration plans to have two aircraft carrier task forces patrolling near the Persian Gulf.

But there is no longer talk of confrontation with the Soviet Union over Afghanistan. The partial grain embargo imposed by Carter to punish the Russians may be lifted by Reagan. Other sanctions apparently are not being considered.

And yet, in Afghanistan, the Soviets are pushing ahead with their effort to force acceptance of President Babrak Karmal's government.

Intelligence sources here say violence is increasing in Kabul, the capital, and other major cities, while bombing of villages has failed to force young men to obey Afghan army draft calls.

Faced with mass desertions, the pro-Soviet government extended the two year term of service in January by six months. Police in Kabul rioted when their duty was lengthened as well.

Miami, Fla. Feb. 22—Drug Enforcement agent Peter Gruden displays some 826 pounds of nearly pure cocaine with an estimated street value of $206.5 million. This is the largest seizure of ready-to-sell cocaine in U.S. history.

Arsenic found in N.E. water

By ANDREW SCHNEIDER
Associated Press

HUDSON, N.H. (AP) — Federal health officials strongly urged wider testing of private wells as potentially dangerous levels of arsenic continued to be found in drinking water throughout New Hampshire and in two Massachusetts towns.

By early yesterday, 611 wells had been tested, mostly in Hudson and Bow. More than 13 percent showed arsenic levels above the 50 parts per billion limit considered safe by the Environmental Protection Agency. Several showed readings classified as dangerous by some health experts.

"There's nothing there to hurt you," insisted William Wallace, acting state health director. "I'd drink the water myself. I think this is all much ado about nothing."

However, leading federal toxicologists and other health experts interviewed by The Associated Press disagreed sharply.

"Some of the levels reported in New Hampshire indicate a risk to health that demands immediate action," said Dr. Erv Bellack, special assistant for chemistry for the EPA in Washington.

Richard Bull, EPA's chief water toxicologist at the agency's national laboratory in Cincinnati, shares Bellack's concern.

"As a toxicologist, I would be very uncomfortable having people drink water with those levels of arsenic," Bull said. "I don't think there's any reason for panic, but I do think people should be urged in the strongest terms to test their private water supplies..."

On Friday, Jim Fuller, chief of water supply for central Massachusetts, said retesting of wells in Leicester and Sterling confirmed high readings.

The testing in Leicester was done after arsenic was found in blood samples of a man in that community.

Group accuses prison of racist brutalities

BOSTON (AP) - A Massachusetts prisoner-aid group has accused the administration of Gov. Edward King of persecuting black inmates at Walpole State Prison, the state's maximum security facility.

The group called Family and Friends of Prisoners said at a news conference yesterday they plan a court suit against King and the Correction Department on charges of racial harassment and discrimination.

The group issued a statement saying black inmates refused to eat or attend any activities Sunday, and will boycott prison jobs today.

There was no immediate comment from state officials.

"I think the white prisoners will join them in a work stoppage," said a spokesman for the group, John Ramos. "Part of it is they are being subjected to brutal beatings and tortures by Walpole prison officials under the pretext of restraint."

Ramos said Walpole currently has a population of 963 inmates, and about 70 percent are black.

Kennedy raps Reagan plan

BOSTON — Sen. Edward M. Kennedy says he may support some of the budget cuts sought by President Reagan but has more than other poor people more than the rich.

The Massachusetts Democrat, in a statement released yesterday, termed the overall Reagan plan "a program of unequal sacrifice."

"In General Motors, perhaps many more, in Massachusetts alone, may have to drop out of college if the Reagan cuts are approved," Kennedy said.

The senator said the income tax cuts proposed by Reagan would not be big enough for a middle income family to offset the impact of the recently sparked up deregulation of oil prices.

Kennedy said he would meet this week with delegates from various human services fields and labor unions to learn more about the likely impact of the Reagan cuts.

Among the cutbacks foreseen by Kennedy is a $50 million reduction in Medicaid for Massachusetts. The federal government presently supplies about half of the Bay State's $1 billion a year Medicaid program.

Cuba urged to halt shipments

NEW YORK — President-nominate Edwin Meese III, saying it would be in "Cuba's own self interest," in halt arms shipments to El Salvador, yesterday warned "it is entirely possible" the United States will take direct action against Cuba to stop the shipments.

Meese would not say what form a blockade, "I think it's in Cuba's own self interest to halt these active intervention right now and end the transmittal of subversion into Central America," Meese said on ABC-TV's "Issues and Answers" program.

Later in the day President Reagan, speaking with reporters as he prepared to board Air Force One for his return flight to Washington following a California vacation, said, "We are all very concerned" about the circumstances in El Salvador.

Meese, in the television interview, said the United States would try to stop the shipments by working with countries through which the weapons are transported. If the negotiations fail, Meese said, "We would take other steps."

Last week, a State Department memorandum charged that Salvadoran civil strife had become "a multifaceted case of indirect armed aggression by Communist powers."

Problem with handicap buses: lifts don't

By STEPHEN M. PORTER
Collegian Correspondent

Nearly four months after the University of Massachusetts received 12 new, 40 foot, PVTA buses, the $15,000 handicap lifts with which they are equipped still cannot be used because a part that costs between $20-$50 is causing problems, said Al Byam, Operations Manager at UMass Transit.

The problem, said Byam, lies in the design of the wheel chair tie-down which is "a clamp mounted on the handicap seat which the wheel chair backs into and secures the chair for riding in the bus. It clamps around one wheel of the chair."

Although the tie-down on the General Motors designed buses fits many regular wheel chairs, it does not fit around most electric chairs with mag wheels, said Byam.

UMass Transit Officials first learned of the design deficiency of the tie-down in early December when they invited members of the Handicap Student Affairs Office, a group with which UMass Transit has worked closely over the years, to test the lifts.

UMass Transit Officials notified the PVTA of their discovery in early December, but, said Byam, because UMass was the first PVTA customer in the area to use the new buses, the PVTA was not aware of the problem and did not have an immediate solution.

The PVTA did, however, decide to order that the lifts be put out of service. Said Byam, "It is possible to use them (the lifts) now, yes, but they've decided not to until they can carry everybody."

Byam said it is difficult to determine who is to blame for allowing the faulty design to slip by unnoticed, but said the fault might lie "with the federal guidelines."

Byam said the PVTA has secured the services of a group which specializes in equipping vans for use by the handicaped, and they are "trying to alter the present design (of the wheel chair tie-down)."

However, said Byam, UMass Transit last contacted the PVTA in late January, and they were not sure when the new design would be ready and the lifts put back into operation.

Byam said although the lifts do fit some wheel chairs, he agrees with the PVTA decision to take them out of service. "Personally, I don't feel we should use them unless they can be secured safely, and I don't feel they can be secured safely," he said.

Federal laws require that all new buses be equipped for the handicapped. Byam said UMass probably would have bought such buses anyway, but added that "if there was no federal involvement, I think General Motors would have built a better bus."

Free beer and books

The February 19, 1958 edition of the Massachusetts Collegian reported on upcoming snow sculpture competition. The event was postponed, although plans had been made for 20th Century Fox and Paramount Movies to send a representative to film the competition for television releases.

The Polar Pay Box Lion offered an express box to Boston leaving from the Hitz Shop in Southampton at "frequent services and low rates."

A Collegian editorial urged seniors to give serious thought to their class gift. The editorial named the following definites: the class gift is a method by which each graduating class manages itself upon the university by defining the campus with flagpoles, indians, etc. The editorial went on to suggest using the $250 allocated to the gift for a scholarship fund or books for the library.

Anyone wanting to see the February 25, 1981 issue of the Collegian a "Pompeii Bug" in the Bahama Islands" was advertised. For $100 plus to persons into the coveted vacation in sunny sun spot with champagne. Refugee at the Prospect Inn and a "Sunset Inner" every night with "Free beer" from 5:30-7:30 every afternoon.

The Campus Center opened in September 1970 and apparently was already experiencing problems with space allocation. An editorial explained "someone finally did something that approaches what should be done with the Campus Center all the time." It went to the students to do what they pleased with it." The students were allowed to set up booths in the "Hub of the Year, Harlow" and sell everything from cotton candy to what the editorial referred to as "Students's pamphlet spice-box." The experiment was not, according to the editorial, a success, and the hole of the "malls" (the Campus Center) remained deserted and empty.

Controversial mini-store topic of meeting tonight

By PAUL BASKEN
Collegian Staff

Students opposed to the recent construction of the Student Union mini-store will hold a meeting tonight to discuss how they will respond to the store and any future similar situations.

Arvid Muller, member of the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) said they are opposed to the store because the Board of Governors, the student group which oversees the Campus Center complex, never voted to approve renovating the former candy counter into the mini-store.

"It's not the job of the BOG to find out if the administration is hiding something from them, it is the responsibility of the administration not to hide anything from the BOG," said Muller.

At a BOG meeting held in February, 1980, the board voted to strongly oppose construction of a mini-store in the Campus Center across from the present University Store. Muller said although plans for the store at that location were dropped, the Campus Center administration later hired a contractor to begin construction in December in the Student Union Building. The BOG again voted in December to oppose construction, but Campus Center Director William Harris said the vote came too late.

Muller said that in a survey conducted by SCERA last fall, 73 percent of responding students opposed construction of the mini-store.

Since February, SCERA has set up a table across from the mini-store to collect signatures on a petition demanding the store and accounts be student controlled and operated. The petition also states that all concessionaire your $3000 within the complex should be decided on, and receive final approval from, the graduate and undergraduate student senates. Muller said approximately 1,200 students have signed the petition.

"If it's not the job of the BOG to find out if the administration is hiding something from them, it is the responsibility of the administration not to hide anything from the BOG," said Muller.

The meeting, open to all students, will be held at 5:30 p.m. in room 168 G of the Campus Center.

Do babies shape parents?

A film and discussion on newborn babies will take place tomorrow night at 7:30. Dr. Berry Brazelton will speak on "Do Newborn Babies Shape Their Parents?" Tickets for the event are $2.50 for UMass students and $3.50 for non students. Proceeds will benefit the University Lab School. More ticket information is available by calling 545 2403.

Basic cooking class offered

A three week cooking class designed primarily for young mothers who would like to learn basic skills and nutrition will be held March 3, 10 and 17 at the Wintergreen Cooperative Solar Greenhouse in Orange, Ma. The class can be registered for by calling 617-544-6516.

Vandalism mars weekend

University of Massachusetts police broke up a fight in MacKimmie Residence Hall in the Southwest Residential Area yesterday at 4:47 a.m. Four men sprayed each other with fire extinguishers and one of the participants was hit with a beer mug, UMass police said.

UMass student Stephen A. Neumeier, 19, of Sudbury was arrested for failure to stop at a stop sign and driving while intoxicated yesterday morning, UMass police said. Neumeier hit another vehicle after failing to stop at the corner of Fearing Street and University Drive. Neumeier will be arraigned this morning at Hampshire District Court.

A fire was reported from Baker Residence Hall in the Central residential area yesterday at 2:55 a.m. UMass police said the fire was apparently started on the second floor of the residence hall when paper on a door was set afire. The fire was out when police came to the scene. The door was scorched and there are no suspects in the case, police said.

In a vandalism incident yesterday morning, an exit sign was found dangling by the wires from the ceiling of Tobin Hall. UMass police said a ceiling panel was reported broken, the damage is estimated at $100. There are no suspects in the incident police said.

In another vandalism incident reported yesterday at 12:07 p.m. in lot 47, a window on the left side of a 1976 Toyota Carolla was broken. The damage is estimated at $75. There are no suspects in the incident police said.

Correction

A price in the Hampshire 4 advertisement in the Feb. 20 issue of the Collegian was incorrect. The 2 p.m. matinee should have been priced at the regular admission price rather than at $1.75. The Collegian regrets any inconvenience this error may have caused.

On Friday, Feb. 20, the Collegian incorrectly reported that the UMass Building Authority approved a dormitory rent increase of $66. The actual increase is $162. It was also reported that the Building Authority approved the increase in executive session. The increase was voted on in public, after the executive session.

JT warms audience

James Taylor
Fine Arts Center, Feb. 19, 1981

By JON OLTSIK
Collegian Correspondent

If you wanted to see a drunken, rowdy concert you probably went to see the Outlaws last night with your Jack Daniels in one hand and your cowboy hat in the other. If your tastes are a bit more mellow and you wanted to hear a moving musical experience, then you were at the James Taylor concert last Thursday night.

From the moment I arrived I had a feeling that this concert would be special. J.T. walked out on stage, picked up his acoustic guitar, and after an ovation went right into "Carolina In My Mind." At this point he had no band to back him up nor did he have any electrical equipment for special effects. Just J.T. and his guitar, and that was enough to capture his audience until he was joined later by his back up band.

A highlight of the concert was Taylor's selection of songs. He has a lot of material to choose from so I wasn't sure what to expect. It came as a pleasant surprise then to hear all the old favorites one thinks of when James Taylor comes to mind: "Fire and Rain," "Steamroller Blues," "Sweet Baby James," "City Streets," etc. He also found time to play some of his more recent material such as "Handy Man," "Secret o' Life," as well as two or three songs which have not yet been released.

Taylor showed his charisma and his professionalism as he entertained his audience. He told a long story about his pet pig before going into a silly song called "Oh Mona." The full house enjoyed both his jokes and the song. He also demonstrated his dexterity when he managed to solve the difficult question: How does one sing a duet by oneself? When he announced his duet a tape recorder came on with J.T.'s voice on it. It sang the other part of the duet, played the guitar, even told a few jokes. Very clever and well done; the marvels of modern technology!

Taylor seemed very sensitive to his music during the whole performance. His eyes did not look at the audience but rather were staring in a far off gaze, or were closed. This mood must have been contagious, as the full house was content to sit quietly or even sing along. During his last song, "You've got a Friend," I detected a tear or two from J.T. When he came out to do his encore, "I Don't Know No Love Song," he apologized for getting all choked up. You're forgiven James. I wish more performers cared for their music and their audience as much.

I have but one complaint about the show, it was too short. Taylor played two sets with a twenty minute break and one encore. I would have liked some more music and so would everyone else as the loudest applause of the night came just before the bummer lights came on telling us to go home.

Taylor's concert was simply a treat for me. I have heard and enjoyed his music for years performed by many people, and I've tried to play it myself, but I had not seen the artist. Now that I have seen him I am not disappointed but rather I am inspired. Judging by the ovation of the crowd and the smiles I saw on their faces as they left the F.A.C., I am not the only one who was pleased.

Shaboo All-Stars rock crowd

Matt "Guitar" Murphy of Blues Brothers fame, appeared with the Shaboo Allstars at the Blue Wall Friday night.

SHABOO ALL-STARS
Bluewall, Feb. 20, 1981

By F.C.WYSE
Collegian Correspondent

The Shaboo All-Stars played to a full house Friday night, coming through with a full-tilt show for an enthusiastic audience. The All-Stars played everything from blues to funk, and rock 'n soul in consistent and thoughtfully paranoid style.

Though Matt "Guitar" Murphy, of the Blues Brothers band, appeared to be the main attraction for the gigantic crowd, this was not the case. Appearing on stage was, on bass from the Sister Sister Band, playing bass, Charles Calloway, from the Billy Joel group, on drums, Jack Scatamuglio from the Chevy Chase band, Marcus Lauter on organ and keyboards from the Jon Cleary band, on saxophone, Dawn Thor and, on lead vocals from the Muddy Waters band, Lollie Foster.

The dance floor was packed a scrunky at the Blue Wall, and the All Stars saw that it stayed that way all night. They held a masterful control over the audience and let them pleased and dancing for more. The sound system was well handled and completed the show thanks go to that unsung hero. There was a little something for every one Friday night from the lesser known blues to popular chart tunes, including such great hits as, "Soul Man," J.J. Cale's "Cocaine," and "I Feel Good" the ghastly, ouch ear-mind out with stunning accuracy, with the life of the originals and with a sense of genuine musicianship.

Murphy's solos were impressive, both technically and melodically and his stage presence was humble and pleasurable. He did however, have a monopoly on the solo time, leaving the saxophonist standing out in the cold perhaps a little too often.

Lollie's solos were fine and well received, his presence subdued and efficient. Scatamuglio's drum work was musical and strong all night and he too solos were inventive and exciting.

The Blue Wall hasn't sounded this good in a long time and we's hope to hear again soon from Shaboo.

Madness, satire grace SW plays

By STEVE ROSENBERG
Collegian Correspondent

Tennessee Williams and John Guare. The first name is immediately recognizable, while the second is slightly obscure.

Williams is a playwright who has been known to write bizarre plays about the south. Guare is a lesser known playwright, who writes about New England. So if you're one of the few who dropped by the Hampden Theater this weekend and caught the intimate premiere of Guare's Home Free, and Williams' The Gnadiges Fraulein, you might still be buzzing from the combination of Tennessee and Stark and Sam-naive presentations.

The two plays, produced and performed by an eight member Greenfield based theater group, will be performing again here this week at Hurwitz Martin's in Northampton.

Home Free, a one-act play, takes place in a funeral parlor in Hampstead, Mass., on the night of the inauguration, 1968. The plot revolves around a Germanophile officer, Peter Smith, his dead wife, his two children, and the anti-German funeral parlor owner. When the owner realizes that the family is German, he threatens to reveal their origins to the fellow townspeople who will happen to be WASP's.

Guare uses the family's struggle to conceal its identity as a guise to poke fun at the notion of ironic unity and pride. Anger is evident when the family speaks of the "suffocation of Lynn ..." Lynn, the "city of fire." The townfolk of Marblehead are not to be treated either. Only Plymouth Rock is spoken of favorably.

Happiness prevails in Home Free, but only after the family's son, a successful niche New York agent returns to pay a final visit to his mother. When the funeral parlor owner sees flowers and a condolence card from John Hendrickson, all is forgiven, and the Smith family resumes its path along the yellow brick road of America.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

Talking to Ralph

So what's all the fuss about anyway?

It was Friday morning in the Student Union and some kid who was late for a chemistry class tried to go into the new mini-store for a newspaper.

"Don't go in there," someone called out.

"What?"

"Don't go in there," the person repeated. "Honor the boycott."

Kevin Cullen

Dormitory rent just went up $162, somebody tried to kill the Pope the other day, Seta Rampersad has been dead for over two years and no one has done a thing about it, and these people are boycotting the mini-store.

There are rightist death squads running around Guatemala abducting and murdering hundreds of people, the world's tallest library is still fairly useless, you still can't get the classes you want around here, and these people are boycotting the mini-store.

We still don't have say in the spring concert, the count is up to 20 black kids murdered in Atlanta, where the hell are we all going to get jobs, financial aid is a mess and is going to get worse, tuition increases are annual, the Red Sox traded Lynn, Hobson and Burleson, and Fisk might be gone, and these people are boycotting the mini-store.

The Distinguished Visitors Program paid Abbie Hoffman $3,500 to speak for 90 minutes, Amherst towing still tows, nobody is liable for the collapse of University buildings because, under Massachusetts law, general contractors cannot hire subcontractors and so are not responsible for the mistakes of the subcontractors they are supposedly overseeing, someone found mushrooms growing on a musty laboratory floor in Marshall Hall up by the Infirmary, and these people are boycotting the mini-store.

They've spent $132,000 in repairs on the campus center garage since 1978, the men's basketball team is 3-21, it's estimated that anywhere between 10,000 and 20,000 Massachusetts college students may have to drop out if Reagan's budget cuts in education go through, the American flag flying next to Whitmore is ripped, Max Robinson backed down down after calling ABC racist, King's budget will cut about $600,000 from this University, there are loose bricks on the Bartlett Hall facade, and these people are boycotting the mini-store.

So, why all the fuss over a candy counter?

Opponents claim the $47,000 used to build the store was illegally allocated by the UMass Board of Trustees. The construction of the mini-store, along with the forementioned rent hike, has led to a suit filed against the trustees by 40 UMass students. The trustees, it seems, never did ask for approval from the UMass Building Authority which, the suit claims, must approve any work involving construction of more than $5,000.

Campus Center Director William Harris says the new store offers a nicer atmosphere and improves upon the old candy counter.

Opponents have a point. Handicapped people can't use the store very well. Everything you can buy in the ministore is available two-minutes away in the University Store. And it is pretty stupid having the thing in the first place.

But, what's the big deal? What is this protest with boycotts and petitions and tables set up across from the store. Why all the fuss?

The UMass Building Authority can retroactively approve the contstruction, and anyone who thinks they would not is naive. But, it's spring and there's protest in the air, so there are tables and petitions and boycotts and threats and law suits.

That kid who wants a newspaper can get one down in the concourse, anyway.

And, it is grand to be young and American.

Should engineers prefer Trident?

Todd Buchanan and Todd Clark

The recent presence on this campus of the recruiters from the Electric Boat division of General Dynamics raises the issue of accelerating nuclear armaments competition and our participation in it as individuals.

Electric Boat is building the Trident submarine, which will carry perhaps the most deadly nuclear weapons to date. Each submarine could house 24 missiles, and each missile could carry ten or more warheads, each with a potential several times that of the bomb that leveled Hiroshima, Japan. According to test results, those warheads are of such accuracy that half of them should, if all goes well, land within a football field length of their targets.

Actually, another warhead—that of our MX missile—has a better chance of destroying a hardened missile silo and anything left inside. The Trident warhead can reach its target within a matter of minutes, depending on its submarine launch location at sea. By virtue of its speed and accuracy, it will be the best first-strike weapon deployed by either side. Whether it was conceived to make first-strike a better proposition or was simply too sweet an idea to pass up, the Soviets, if they are anything like us, must assume the worst.

The Trident submarine and the MX missile are the most blatant aspects of the resurgent American faith in the 'tough guy' strategy. We have been less than clever with the Russians, and perhaps we need to be firmer on occasion, but the Trident submarine and the MX missile do not address our security problems.

Better survivability of our offensive intercontinental forces could be had without building these two systems. All they can add to an already greater than sufficient nuclear arsenal is a better theoretical first-strike capability that might effect an adversary in two ways. One, it might have some marginal influence on their willingness to let a crisis with the U.S. escalate. Two, should a crisis escalate regardless, the more vulneralbe the adversary feels their missiles are to ours the greater the pressure to jump the gun. All talk of assured retaliation notwithstanding, neither side is likely to wait out an attack which it fears is imminent.

While speculation about the crisis implications of Trident and MX is tenuous, guessing the implications for the arms race is easy. Without a doubt, the Russians will build what they believe they need to counterbalance these systems. The Trident submarine and the MX missile could not have kept the Russians out of Afghanistan, nor could they have a smidgeon of bearing on a Soviet decision to move on Poland.

These systems will consume far over 100 billion dollars in American resources—resources better spent elsewhere, if the government must spend them at all.

The Trident submarine, then, is wholly worthy of our active opposition. If we can see ourselves as historical people—people with an appreciation for the human effort that has preceded us and a desire to contribute our part so that effort may live on—what should we do about the abominable Trident submarine?

At minimum, we can decline to participate in its construction. Life does not demand an inordinate effort of most of us here, but it does ask a few things.

Nummo News combats racism

Nummo News is a section which appears in the Collegian every Monday. It deals with Third World issues and news. Just the other day I noticed quite a few people who mechanically opened the Collegian, removed the Nummo section, and threw it away.

The people who contribute to Nummo News spend quite a lot of time attempting to inform everyone of Third World affairs; it is not just for Third World students. If more people would take the time to read this section, we might grasp a better understanding of one another. Racism is an issue very much present in our society. Ignorance has never solved the problem, but only contributes to it.

Clara Lima Northeast

. . .and it doesn't

We understand that the Collegian is not responsible for the contents of Nummo News, but we cannot help but comment on the most racist remarks we have yet seen on the pages of that publication. We refer specifically to the Ten Black Commandments, written by Godfrey Patterson (2/17/81). This essay perpetuates the segregation of people by an "Us" and "Them" mentality, like the bigoted propaganda of the KKK and the American Nazi Party.

For example, paragraph seven reads: "We must stop imitating the degenerate actions of white people whose world order is diametrically opposed to the legitimate aspirations of Black and other oppressed people." What if the words black and white were interchanged and this were to appear in a university funded publication? The black community would be outraged, and rightly so. There is no room in a society which desires racial harmony for these types of sentiments.

If Nummo News is to print this sort of racist propaganda it should be distributed separately from the Collegian, because it only serves to arouse hostilities inside our community.

Peter Daley
Robert Del Gizzi
David Jacobs

Editor's note: As a point of clarification, Nummo News is a student newspaper produced separately from and editorially independent of the Collegian. Nummo is inserted into the Collegian for the purpose of distribution.

How do you practice space shuttle landings without the space shuttle?

Simulation, an advanced...and advancing... technology is the answer.

And Link is where it all began.

Back in World War II, thousands of American pilots got their first "flying" lessons in the famous Link Trainer...the world's first flight simulator. When the pilot operated its controls, the "Blue Box" rocked about its pivots to provide a realistic simulation of the physical sensations of flight.

Forty years later, our newest flight simulators make experienced jet aircraft pilots sweat as they practice final-approach landings and other difficult and dangerous tasks under the watchful eye — and instruments — of the instructor.

But today's difficult and public concern for Reliability, Safety, and Efficiency in power generating plants — both conventional and nuclear — has shifted the entire emphasis and is creating a whole new dimension in simulation systems.

New power-generating facilities cannot be brought on line without hands-on training for operators. And the training must be done in control rooms precisely duplicating those of the new plants. In addition, utilities and regulating agencies now demand specialized training (and retraining) for personnel who operate existing plants.

This unprecedented demand for power plant control room simulation systems has created one of the biggest backlogs of engineering and technical manufacturing programs in our long history and has opened up scores of opportunities for graduates in virtually every field of technology.

Link, as the pioneer in this existing field, is its leading exponent of new ideas. New ideas rank first among our many resources and we are always seek them from our people. At Link, your assignments will give you opportunities to contribute meaningfully and creatively, as well as opportunities to learn from the leaders in the field.

To help ease the transition from the academic world to the practical world of engineering science, Link provides each new technical employee with a PROFESSIONALLY PLANNED ORIENTATION PROGRAM. Link technical staff members who have been through the program are unanimous in their praise of the program.

If you are interested in a career in any area of technology: Electrical/Mechanical • Chemical Engineering • Physics • Nuclear Science • Health Physics • Mathematics • Computer Science • Thermodynamics • Heat Transfer • Fluid Mechanics.

Think Link. There's no better place to start a rewarding and meaningful career than with the leader.

The Competition: No losers

The Competition
By ANDREW GORDON
Collegian Staff

In a time when the American movie-going public is being dished nothing but big-screen sitcoms and low-budget shockers, The Competition comes as a breath of fresh air.

Many filmmakers today do not realize that a movie is only as interesting as the characters it portrays.

It is a light, human and compassionate story about a group of contestants in a classical piano competition.

Richard Dreyfuss and Amy Irving star as two of six finalists who "break the cardinal rule of competition" by falling in love. We see the two grow as their relationship grows and we come to like and understand them.

These are not the only characters we become involved with though. The other finalists include a young Russian girl played by Vickie Kriegler; Ty Henderson as a fanny, upper-class black; a precise and boring Adam Stern; and Joseph Cali as a street-wise Romeo. There is also Sam Wanamaker as the pompous conductor and Lee Remick as Irving's teacher.

It is in these characters that the film's major asset lies. We get a glimpse into the characters of some very diverse types and we like than. It is a film without bad guys and because of this, because the audience comes to care about the characters they are watching, the film succeeds. Many film-makers today do not realize that a movie is only as interesting as the characters it portrays.

Those most immediately responsible for these characterizations are, of course, the actors, and The Competition has an excellent assemblage of performers. Dreyfuss, although slightly miscast as a 23 year old, is good as the more neurotic side of the love pair, and Amy Irving is great as the understanding half. Irving, as well as most of the supporting case, should have little trouble finding work as a result of this film.

Joel Oliansky, however, is really the one to praise for this film. Oliansky, who both wrote and directed The Competition, is a newcomer to the motion picture field who has quickly grasped an understanding of what a film should and should not do. Oliansky has also recruited the talents of some fine production men. The film was edited by David Blewitt (The Buddy Holly Story) and filmed by Richard Kline (The Fury, Star Trek). Kline's high angle shots are particularly effective.

The camera work, combined with good pacing, a human and intelligent script, nice performances, and Oliansky's solid direction, make for a film that can be enjoyed by even the most devout classical music hater.

The Competition, which is rated PG, is currently playing at the Hampshire 4 theater in Hampshire mall.

Juggling is what it's all about as Randy Brown, a visitor from Cambridge, demonstrated in the Campus Center yesterday.

★SW Plays

In the second play, Gradiges Fraulein, the setting switches to the porch of a run down boarding house in tropical Casabonny Key, Florida. A society reporter turns up at the house after hearing about a woman boarder, Gradiges Fraulein, who strolls about with blood flowing from her eyes, sporadically blurting out non-sequitor phrases in German.

During the course of her visit, the society women smokes several sticks of "Mary-Jane" with the land-lord, watches an inanimate chicken poke the eyes out of Fraulein, and finally, allows herself to be seduced by "Indian Joe," the resident macho man.

Constantly stoned, the gossip reporter has transformed from an outside reporter into an active member of the boarding house. Baked from the weed and mired in a state of concupiscense for Indian Joe, she pays no heed to Fraulein, who by the curtain call, is screaming hysterically while she wipes the spurting blood from her eyes onto her dress of rags.

Welcome to Williams' house of madness.

★Arsenic

Today, Dr. Peter Drotman, an epidemiologist from the National Center for Disease Control, will start a week-long examination of babies born last year in Hudson. Evaluation of those studies at CDC's Atlanta headquarters will take at least two months.

Dr. Henry Falk, head of the center's chronic disease division, said infants are being tested because they are more susceptible than adults to toxic poisoning.

"This study could give us useful information on what arsenic does to infants and specifically what it's doing to the infants of Hudson, but it will tell us very little about what is happening in other communities," Falk said. "To ascertain if harmful levels of arsenic are present elsewhere, those other areas must be tested.

"About six of the 15 wells tested in Sterling showed a positive reading," he said. "The readings are high enough to start setting off some warning bells to take a real hard look at what's happening."

Fuller said that because Sterling is about 25 miles from Leicester he doesn't think the arsenic is from the same source.

"They checked everything for arsenic and found it in the patient's water. It showed 560 parts per billion of arsenic. It was so high we checked it twice," Fuller said. "His wife is now showing signs of arsenic poisoning."

The majority of the contaminated water appeared to be coming from private wells. State officials estimate that 300,000 people draw water from these wells, which are not controled by the federal Clean Water Act and therefore usually not inspected by state or federal agencies.

Hudson was the first of nine New Hampshire communities to report high arsenic levels in well water. Bow, Rollinsford, Barrington, Seabrook, Londonderry, Pelham, Windham and Litchfield subsequently were added to the list.

Phil Laurien, town manager, said Saturday three adults in the community of 14,000 on the Massachusetts border, report symptoms of arsenic poisoning.

HONEYWELL
The Computer Sciences Department of Honeywell's Systems and Research Center has outstanding opportunities for qualified scientists and engineers to perform research and advanced development.
The Sciences and Research Center is a rapidly growing organization. We maintain a posture at the leading edge of System and Control Sciences, Man Machine Sciences, Physical and Optical Sciences, Information Sciences, and Computer and Microelectronic Sciences.
Positions in the Computer Sciences Department exist in the following areas: Capability based computer architecture, distributed computer architecture, portable secure operating systems, decentralized operating systems, formal software specification and verification, communications protocols, Ada program support environments, and Ada compilers.
Applicants should have an MS or PhD in Computer Science or Electrical Engineering, or a BS and relevant experience.
We offer an industrial research environment which is challenging and stimulating, allows individual freedom, and encourages dynamic growth. Our salary and benefit programs are highly competitive.
We will be recruiting on February 23, 1981. Contact the College placement office for details and to make an appointment for an interview.

TAKE ON THE COMPETITION AFTER YOU GRADUATE

Graduation is coming up fast. And so is competition in life. Competition with a lot of other people ahead of you who already have skill training and on-the-job experience.

But the Army of the 80's can help you handle it. With guaranteed training in the skill you sign up for. Like Journalism. Language. Music. Or technical skills like aviation technology, electronics, communications, medicine, mechanics. The Army teaches over 200 different skills.

"LOAN FORGIVENESS"

You can start life after college by clearing up your college debts. The Army offers repayment of loans made under the Higher Education Act of 1965 (Parts B & E). Paying back 33⅓% or $1500 (whichever is greater) for each year you serve on active duty. And, of course, you'll also be earning good pay and benefits in return for your enlistment.

MONEY FOR GRADUATE SCHOOL

Only in the Army can a qualified soldier serve just 24 months and come home with up to $5040 for college tuition. For three years it's up to $12,100. For four years up to $14,100. And only the Army offers more enlistment bonuses than any other service.

OPPORTUNITIES YOU CAN'T MATCH

Opportunities you can't match anywhere else: that's the technical Army of the 80's. Look down the-road: see where you want to go. The Army can help you get there.

UM's Voll sweeps into Women's Ski Nationals

By ANTONY KUNDERT
Collegian Staff

Highlighting the University of Massachusetts' women's ski team performance in the Eastern Championships Friday and Saturday at Loon Mt., N.H. was the incredible skiing of sophomore Sweepy Voll. For the first time in the 15 year history of the UMass women's ski team, a woman has qualified for the (Association of Intercollegiate Athletics for Women) National Intercollegiate Ski Championships, in Montana on March 2.

Voll managed a sixth in the giant slalom and a ninth in the slalom to easily qualify in both events. The first 15 in each event qualify.

"It was an extremely unusual performance for a hill town (Dalton) girl against former U.S. ski team members and nationally ranked competitors," coach Bill MacConell said. "A fantastic performance!"

In the team standings, UMass finished eighth overall of 12 teams competing. The top five teams qualify to go to the Nationals. Middlebury College took the number one spot followed by the University of Vermont, Dartmouth College, New England College, and the University of New Hampshire.

UMass was selected to be one of the twelve teams participating in the Easterns by being the number one team in the Women's Intercollegiate Ski Conference (WISC).

The snow conditions at both races were not helped by the warm temperatures and periodical rain showers. Only the persistant work of the organizers and the racers themselves allowed the races to be held. The snow was plowed onto the course from the side of the trail and the slope was salted to make the snow hard. The meet was originally scheduled for Brodie Mt. in Ashford but was moved to Loon Mt.

The giant slalom race on Friday was a very tough course that took approximately 75 seconds to complete. Three former U.S. ski team members took the first three places, Laurie Bakerof UVM, Leslie Baker of Middlebury, and Leslie Leeth Smith (Middl.). Sweepy Voll took a remarkable sixth place finish. Bobbi Vell and Theresa Collins finished 32 and 35 for UMass.

"I had no expectation of how I would do this year. Last year I figured top 15 (she placed 23rd and 21st). After the first run of the giant slalom this year I became really confident," Sweepy Voll said.

Irish upset No. 1 Virginia

CHICAGO (AP) — Orlando Woolridge's 16-foot jump shot as time ran out lifted 11th-ranked Notre Dame to a 57-56 upset victory Sunday over top-ranked Virginia, breaking the longest victory string among major college teams and handing the Cavaliers their first loss of the season.

With 10 seconds remaining, Virginia's Lee Rake, threw away an inbounds pass, and after a timeout Notre Dame made its move. Tracy Jackson missed a shot and Kelly Tripucka was stripped of the ball as he attempted to shoot.

Woolridge grabbed the ball and let fly with the game-winning basket.

Notre Dame trailed 53-51 with 4:05 to play when Woolridge sank a pair of free throws to tie the score for the 16th time in the contest. Virginia then ran more than two minutes off the clock before Ralph Sampson put the Cavaliers ahead 55-53.

With 35 seconds left, Jeff Jones made the first of two free throws to give Virginia a 56-53 lead. Notre Dame's John Paxson cut the lead with a pair of free throws before the hectic windup.

Woolridge and Paxson finished with 12 points, with Jackson topping the Fighting Irish with 14. Raker led Virginia with 16 points.

The loss left the Cavaliers with a 23-1 record, while the Irish hiked their mark to 20-4. The defeat broke Virginia's 28- game winning streak over a two-year span, the nation's longest victory string among major college teams.

The first half was ended with Notre Dame on top 30-28. There were an amazing 12 ties, at every two-point level up to 24-24, as neither team was able to take more than a two-point lead.

Spikers comeback, triumph over UNH

The University of Massachusetts men's volleyball team tallied back for their sixth victory of the season by defeating the University of New Hampshire yesterday afternoon in Durham N.H. Their record now stands at 6-1.

The spikers came back after dropping their first game 10-15, to take the next three 15-4, 16-14, 15-7.

"We really broke their backs in that third game," UMass coach Al Morel said.

"After our five day layoff we started out a little slowly, but we rolled over them in that fourth game," Morel said.

Morel pointed out Pat Ryan and Mark Ruegg as having outstanding performances for the Minutemen.

The spikers will next take on Bryant College this Thursday at NOPE at 8:00. UMass will also host the New England Open this weekend at Boyden.

In junior varsity action the spikers dropped two straight games to Brown University yesterday at NOPE 10-15, 8-15.

Rhode Island downs UM wrestlers, 25-9

By DONNA SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

In front of an audience larger than any other that has seen this year, the University of Massachusetts wrestling team lost a tough one to the University of Rhode Island Saturday in a meet that was much closer than the 25-9 score would indicate. The matmen won two and tied one match but the losses were all by very few points.

"I thought we were gonna do a little better than we did," UMass head coach Dave Amato said. "But I don't think we're the best so bad that we can't compete with the New Englands are next week. We've got to work hard and we'll come back."

The Rams beat New England champs--Bob Eze, 167 pounds, Ezo and UMass Kevin Murphy (126 lb.) wrestled to a scoreless tie throughout the first period and went into the third with a 1-1 score. Most of the scoring was done in the third including the three point mouthful that put Eze out front to stay.

134 pound Charlie Biegelsno was the first Mass wrestler to come off the mat with a win, outlasting Erath Briggs 9-3. Biegelsno built up a good lead before bothered and several periods later hit him off the mat for by a 3 point takedown. Biegelsno held on to put three points on the board for UMass.

With six matches completed and UMass down 16-3, 167 pound Dave McEntee took to the mat, and came out strong against URI's Anthony D'Arezzo. McEntee came close to pinning D'Arezzo more than once in the first and second periods and finished the match 12-8.

Heavyweight John Allen was the final point getter for the matmen tying Eyans 2-2 in the final match at Boyden.

Allen tied 2-2 at the final buzzer, had to settle for the tie because of Brantley's riding time that amounted to over a minute. Allen took Brantley 30-7 during last season and edged by him with riding time in the finals of last year's New England championships.

UMass 730 pound wrestler Bill McQuaide was the unlucky party in a match that "Tod have gone either way. McQuaide the match Giles battled evenly for most of the match but the breaks seemed to favor Giles, who won 9-3. McQuaide is New England champ will undoubtedly be seeded first in the New England's at Boston University this weekend, as will Carroll and Allen, also defending champs.

URI took the team championship last year with three first places and 85 3/4 points. (Mass placed second with three wins and 83 3/4 points). URI has had two of their three champs graduate, only Eze remains.

Hoopmen doused at GW

By MIKE ESTRADA
Collegian Staff

The inside-outside combination of Oscar Wilmington and Curtis Jeffries combined for 36 points at George Washington University Saturday night, where the Colonials dumped the UMass Minutemen for the second time this season, 97-61.

Wilmington, a physical six foot-three inch forward who scored 14 points at Cleary seven rebounds for the hosts. Jeffries, who was absent from the first meeting with UMass because of the flu, was the Colonial's top point-getter with 19 markers.

The performance by the GWU tandem barely overshadowed a sterling performance by Minuteman forward Edwin Green. Green led all scorers with 20 points and snagged 13 rebounds. Swingman Craig Smith added 14 points.

The loss was the Minutemen's 11th in a row. Still winless in the Eastern Eight, coach Jay Wilson's charges fall to 3 23 on the season. George Washington improves its record to 6 18.

According to Wilson, things "didn't go well" for the Minutemen. Ahead by just four points with one minute left in the first half, the Colonials scored six straight points to take a ten-marker lead into the locker room.

After an exchange of several buckets to start the second half, GWU Wilson said, outfoulled UMass in a 14-2 blitz that netted the Minutemen.

Including Wilmington and Jeffries, five players scored more than 10 points for coach Bob Tallent's Colonials. Sophomore guard Handy Davis netted 14 points. Junior Wilbert Skipper and Senior Curtis Smith each tallied 12 points.

Tony DePina and Bill Bayno each scored eight points for UMass. Tyrone Whiteherd and Jeff Eberly added seven and four points respectively.

The Minutemen end their regular season schedule against Eastern Eight cross-town rivals when they host the Panthers of the University of Pittsburgh tomorrow night at the Cage. Pittsburgh dumped Eastern Eight leader West Virginia Saturday night at Pitt's Fitzgerald Field House. The Mountaineers would assume coach Roy Chipman would like to make easy prey of the Minutemen.

But Wilson said a large crowd "would help" UMass end its winless skein in the Eastern Eight.

"Maybe the crowd can do for us Tuesday what they did against Boston University," Wilson said.

Against BU, the Minutemen played their most inspired game of the year and with the help of a small but boisterous Cage contingent, stayed close to the Terriers before bowing in the final minutes, 63-56.

Breen's Bruins lead IM hockey

By KEVIN CULLEN
Collegian Staff

Perennial power Breen's Bruins, appearing in their eighth consecutive season of play, currently sit atop the University of Massachusetts intramural hockey league, with a 5-1 record.

The Bruins, whose 26 goals also lead the league, are two points ahead of the Mudsuckers and defending champions What The Puck, who defeated the Americans (4-3) in double overtime in December to take last semester's title.

According to league official Dusty Burke, the Bruins have the best passing team in the league, led by scorers Jack McDonnell, John Burns, Steve Lawrence and defensively by UMass junior varsity baseball coach Paul White.

If the Bruins are susceptible it would have to be defensively, as they have allowed 16 goals for an average of four per game. But with the Bruins, the Mudsuckers have Right in net and a strong defense, allowing just five goals in five games, while What The Puck, led by ex-UMass varsity defenseman Chris Lowery, have let in just nine goals while scoring 23, second only to the Bruins.

No one is counting the defending champs out, however. After an opening game 5-3 loss to the Bruins, What The Puck has run off three straight wins, the most recent of which was a 4-0 trouncing of the same Americans who had given them a run in last semester's final.

The top six teams will advance to the playoffs, which begin March 15. The regular season, a 10 game schedule of each team playing 10 games, ends March 12, while the top six teams will battle for the playoffs, which are slated to begin March 15.

All league games are played at Greenfield, Arena, 6 p.m. to midnight on Sundays and Mondays, 9 p.m. to midnight on Tuesdays and Thursdays, and are open to the public.

"SERIOUS BIZNESS"

AMHERST--In honor of Black History Month, the musical group "Serious Bizness" will perform at 7 pm ,Feb. 27 in the Cape Cod Lounge of the Student Union at the University of Massachusetts/Amherst. The performance is free and open to the public.

Ngoma and Janibu Hill, the hus band and wife duo who make up "Serious Bizness," sing songs with a message of love and hope for the common people of this country. In the tradition of such singers as Bernice Reagan, Gil Scott-Heron and Bob Marley, their songs focus on such problems as unemployment and poor education.

The Hills have performed in off-Broadway productions by Amiri Barika.

The performance is sponsored by the Herter Gallery and the Augusta Savage Gallery of the University.

POETRY READING

On Thursday, February 26 at 8:00 pm in Thompson 104, James Steele, National Chairperson of the Young Worker's Liberation League, and Antar Mberri, noted Black-American poet, will participate in the Salute to Black History Month at the University of Massachusetts. The program will consist of a speech by James Steele and a poetry reading with music by Antar Mberri. Steele will speak on "The Fight Against Racism and Building the Youth and Student Movement of the 80Os. The main theme of his talk will be the need for black-white unity in the struggles against racism, budget cutbacks and the draft. This event is being sponsored by : Ahora, UMass Arts Council, Black Mass Communications Project, Commuter Collective, Malcolm X Center, Students Against the Draft, SCERA Anti-Racism Team, W.E.B. DuBois Branch of the Young Worker's Liberation League, and Western Massachusetts Venceremos Brigade.

CRS

The Center for Racial Studies (CRS) is located at Southwest Residential College, University of Massachusetts, Amherst.

Its major goal is to provide learning opportunities in the area of anti-racist consciousness. To achieve this goal the CRS offers academic courses, workshops, colloquia and an assortment of other related services to area residents. Unfortunately, however this vital services have been severely curtailed by relentless budgetary cuts. Ironically, this is happening at a time when vigorous efforts should be made against the resergence of rapid reaction. We believe that in these bleak times mutual support among progressives is imperative.

The Distinguished Visitors' Program (DVP) is the organization which brings writers, political figures and other guest lecturers to campus. Past visitors have included Dick Gregory, Angela Davis, Jane Fonda and Tom Hayden, Andrew Young, Red Sox Stars Bill Lee and Carl Yaztremski, Abbie Hoffman and many others.

Students involved in DVP coordinate all aspects of program production contacting speakers, arranging contracts, generating campus publicity, working security and providing hospitality. Valuable organizational and promotional skills can be acquired by working with experienced DVP members. If you've already got some of these skills, DVP programs are an excellent way to gain more experience.

Come to the DVP recruitment meeting Tuesday, February 24 at 7:00 pm in Campus Center 165. Refreshments will be served.

LECTURE

On Tuesday, February 24, 1981, the Afro-American Society will proudly present Dr. Marianna Davis of the Women's Research Project of Benedict College, South Carolina.

Dr. Davis is currently working on a massive $460,852 project about the little known contributions American Black Women have made to this country. This monumental work will consist of ten separate books of more than 2000 American Black Women from 1776-1977 in the fields of business, civil rights, government, law, education, medicine, politics, natural science and the arts. This lecture should be not only educational but also thought-provoking.

The lecture will take place in Campus Center Rm. 174-176 at pm. The topic of Dr. Davis's lecture will be the contributions that Black American Women have made to this country from the Civil War era to the present.

"Black History month is something that is very much needed. But I don't think it is observed propedly. There should be special programs to really bring up the awareness of the Black and White community. I don't think that is being done right now."

Deirdre Earl
(Freshman; Business Management)

"Black History means to me: the accumulation of Black History. Not just from when civil rights started but from our total history starting about 4000 B.C., back in Africa. It also means unity of the people everywhere. It means it is time to stop all this half-stepping and get together."

Gertrudis Garcia

"The Black heritage is present in our life because in Puerto Rico Blacks were also introduced as slaves. It is important to take time to analyse our history and to let others know about our culture. The Black History Month gives us that opportunity."

400 YEARS OF SLAVERY

1981 AND STILL SLAVES

BY Curtis Haynes Nummo staff

§In the last two weeks I have tried to give an account of the history of the African-american in America. My purpose was not to give a day by day account of what has, and is happening to us, but rather, to show our plight to those who would read. Well, as I started to write this final segment I began to realize what was missing.

§I was talking like a teacher, you know one of those people who we try to keep away from. One of those people who sends jitters down our spines when they ask for our homework and we haven't done it.

§Well I am not one of those people even though I do want to teach.

§I am a black man in America... and I am concerned about what this country is doing to me... and what this country is doing to the world...

In America ... we are living a lie every time we turn on the T.V.... the radio... or go to a Disco...

America is teaching us lies... Mork and Mindy... Flash Gordon... Wonder Woman... The Hulk...

Curtis Blow and the Rappers Delight... Coca Cola and Ultra-brite...

They tell us that we are being held hostage...

It is to the point that they tell us what we should do how we should do it and where it should be done...

All hell breaks loose when we pick up a book... those of us who even bother...

Life aint worth living unless we get a piece of ass...

What type of BULL SHIT is this...

WE WANT FREEDOM...

We want freedom to escape from this plastic world of make believe...

We want freedom from the real world of ghettos and poverty...

It is inevitable that it will come...

We want the freedom to KNOW that we are to treat each other with respect...

We want the freedom to KNOW that this world was made for all peoples...

We want the freedom to KNOW the avenues of our spirit, mind and soul...

We want the freedom to have a family... a family based on love...

But the sad and ironic fact is that America and capitalism has got us so brain-washed that we don't even know what beauty is...

Hate... and more HATE...

Young Children are being MURDERED in Atlanta... and we watch it on T.V. as if it were another movie... Hart to Hart McMillian and Wife...

We can no longer distinguish between fantasy and reality... lets take a trip to Fantasy Island... on the Love Boat...

And 19 beautiful young children have been murdered in Atlanta...

But America tells us we can do nothing about it... it is a job for the police...

BULL SHIT...

The man works for money... power...

How can you trust someone who is controlled by money... power...

You CAN'T...and the STRUGGLE goes on...
Peace be with you brother...

Strength in your walk...A book in your hand... the truth in your heart... determination in your soul...

PEACE BE WITH YOU BROTHER...

FEBRUARY IS BLACK HISTORY MONTH...

REDEDICATION OF THE MALCOM X CENTER

by Segun Eubanks
NUMMO STAFF

On Saturday February 21, over 100 members of the community gathered to honor the great Malcolm X on the 16th anniversary of his assassination. The program; which was commentated by Barron Roland, Communications Coordinator of the Malcolm X Center, consisted of speakers, poetry readings, food and entertainment.

Keynote speaker Askia Muhammed Toure enlightened us of the importance of Malcolm's life and what Malcolm accomplished. He spoke of Malcolm's transition into the Black Muslim movement and he told the true story of how Malcolm seperated from the movement to become part of a "massive nationalist black movement." Malcolm went on to surpass all other black leaders of his time to become an internationally renowned leader of the African-American people. Malcolm went on to accomplish many things. He introduced the concept of self-defense to the people, brought the people together, and he was prepared to take the case of U.S. genocide and violation of human rights to the United Nations. Malcolm even negotiated to try to get an atom bomb for the country of Ghana. It was because of these activities that Malcolm was killed. This great leader was a humble, uncompromising, and strong man. He did not look down on his people. He was a part of his people and he looked to them for consultation and help. Askia went on to say that Malcolm's assassination was the beginning of a massive offensive by the U.S. government that is still going on today.

Askia also spoke of peoples attitudes toward black leaders. He says the Black people have developed a "Moses complex." Toure said that black people have to save themselves. They must follow their leaders but not idolize and worship them. "Strong people will have leaders, but weak people will have strong men." He says that for this genocide to stop people must unite and be strong. And for those who feel that the struggles of the 1960's are over, Askia says: "Until we are free it ain't never over."

Many other people from the community spoke about how they felt about Malcolm X and the principles he stood for. Alex Murkison stated; "Malcolm X meant hope, possibility, and strength to me." Shaneef Rashod enlightened the people with poetry about how black peoples minds are being manipulated and brainwashed by the society around them. Crystal Banks, co-coordinator of the Malcolm X center read poetry about Malcolm and what he stood for. Barron Roland spoke about black people getting together. He said "people should learn to love each other." Brother Gregory Smith also provided us with a touch of entertainment.

Tony Crayton, thee director of the Office of Third World Affairs, delivered a very powerful speech centered around the theme of genocide against the black people of America. Crayton spoke of the various killers "outside of the law." The murders of 20 black children in Atlanta, the murders of 10 blackmen in Buffalo, the slasher in New York who killed 4 men in a period of 8 hours, and the murders of 11 black women in Boston Mass. He told the audience of a personal experience when a close friend lost his wife and three children in a fire that was set so the landlord could collect money from an insurance company. He spoke of the KKK and how Grand Dragon Bill Wilkinson bragged that they are currently training for a "race war." He stated such racism is spread all over the country as evidence by 3 Klan training camps in Connecticut.

He spoke of how many so called "Black leaders" say that the way to prevent crime in the Black community is to increase the police force. However, all the police are killing Blacks. Seventy-nine percent of all people killed by cops are Black not including Hispanics. (That's about 4 out of 5 people). He mentioned the names of Levi Hart and Arthur McDuffie, and an incident that occured in NY city about one month ago where two men were killed and two wounded by policemen and the men hadn't even committed any type of crime.

Crayton's strong and emotional oratorical presentation brought out feelings of anger, sorrow, and frustration to many people in the audience. It also seemed to bring about a sense of unity, for the people knew that only unity could protect us from this genocide and mass murder.

The evening ended with a ceremonial lighting of candles. The people gathered around, held hands for a few moments of silence in memory of the great leader Malcolm X. Then brother Gregory Smith recited a beautiful piece that reminded us of how unique and important each and every one of us are.

It was a very successful and rewarding ceremony and many people left with a warm feeling in their heart. The spirit of Malcolm X will always be inside of us and we as a people should never forget what he stood for. Malcolm stood for the principles of justice, liberty, and equality. He stood for strength, unity, and a beautiful black nation. Most important is that Malcolm X believed that black people in America and the world could gain these rights and goals "by any means necessary." The most that we could do in memory of this infamous black leader is to keep believing that we as a people united can gain the rights that Malcolm X lived and died for.

DR JOSE RAMON DE LA TORRE

Visiting Lecturer at UMass

by Gertrudis Garcia
NUMMO STAFF

Two weeks ago (Monday February 9, 1981) Dr. Jose Ramon De La Torre offered a lecture about the Puerto Rican Modern Novel to an audience consisting of professors, students and friends of the Latin American community in UMass. Although the main purpose of Dr. De La Torre's visit was to work out an exchange program of professors between the University of Puerto Rico and the University of Massachusetts, he presented a well documented conference about the development of the modern novel in the island. Dr. De La Torre, who is Dean of the Faculty of Humanities at the University of Puerto Rico spoke about a novel which although very young, already has or uses the modern techniques of this literary genre.

"...Though it (the modern novel) started a little late, in 1949 Pedro Juan Soto's El Francotirador was published. This is the first (Puerto Rican) novel that uses the techniques of the Ibero-American modern novel." With these words Dr. De La Torre started his lecture. He mentioned a series of novels, product of this literary movement on the island, but he soon centered those of Emilio Diaz Valcarcel (Figuraciones en el Mes De Marzo) and Edgardo Rodriguez Julia's (La Renuncia Del Negro Saltazar) and finished his lecture.

After mentioning briefly some novels, Dr. De La Torre went back in the political and economical history of Puerto Rico to point out the reasons for the late development of the novel. "There is no such thing as a literary vacuum" said Dr. De La Torre to emphasize the fact that the Puerto Rican novel does not descend from nonexistence created by political and economical circumstances.

"The history of Puerto Rico shows that since the beginning of the colonization there didn't exist the development of a national identity in the island. Spain didn't succeed on this because through the various centuries living on the island when this was 'discovered' by Spain were extinguished, their influence is present in our culture. There are other things that worked against the development of a national identity (and folklore as a by-product of this), and a bourgeois class:

> the low population of the island which was composed of freed and slave blacks, and poor whites most of them illiterate.
> the monopoly in comerce and communications that Spain had over the island
> Dutch and English attacks,
> and an economy copied from that of Spain.... "but a Spain apart from the capitalist/bourgeois processes in France and England..."

The development of Puerto Rican literature could be said to have started in the 19th century. By then time the literature expresses those ideas that we found were political and economical. "Because this was the genesis in the medium through which the bourgeois expressed, and neither the proletariat nor the colonial mentality had time to be developed at the moment."

According to Dr. De La Torre, in the 19th century Latin American countries started their liberation struggles. "It is at this time when Spain shut the frontiers on colonies" who exposed the colonial conditions which would lead to the struggles through their writings. Though not at the same time Puerto Rico suffered the mental insecurity and disloyalty at the time. Spain is now in the time of national definition that Manuel Alonso in El Gibaro appeared.

"El Gibaro is the first Puerto Rican self-portrait...the Puerto Rican describes himself literally." After this, the novel continued its development, but the novels written were of some political symbolism without a profound analysis of the conditions existing on the island.

At he end of the 19th century, when Puerto Rico attained a more authonomous government, "needed for the exercise of its maturity and independence", the US invasion took place. "The impact that the invasion had in Puerto Rico has been studied by many (historians), yet the consecuences and incalculable effects have not been seen...One country that was within a code of relations with its metropolis that was Spain,...a well known code...already had a language to communicate its problems to the metropolis and precisely when it got the total autonomy, it started again as apprentice in other 'work table' that doesn't understand. Fails to recognize the vital rules of the new game and it is put in the most humiliating position by means of a deconsummation of the language."

In the literature the novel is an strong tool of the members of the literary group disconnected from ordinary social contact with their authorized reality.

It is at this decade of the60's that Enrique Laguerre achieves and start writing memorable. It was his work that established the backbone of the Puerto Rican novel. Dr. De La Torre mentioned other writers among them Abelardo Diaz Alfaro, Ernesto Juan Fonfrias and Cesar Andreu Iglesias. "There where the economic development of the country was more significant, it today Puerto Rico has writers who are presenting novels of high quality, using new techniques and approaches is because of those who put the foundations upon which their works stand.

As I mentioned before, Dr. De La Torre selected three novels to present his analysis of the Puerto Rican modern novel. These were Pedro Juan Soto's El Francotirador (1965), Emilio Diaz Varcalcer Figuraciones en el Mes De Marzo (1972), and Edgardo Rodriguez Julia's La Renuncia Del Negro Saltazar (1974).

These novels share some elements in their narrative and in the way the writers present their views of their nation and its society. All of them are able to create a closer realtionship between the main characters and the reader. This happens because the novels presents problems, conditions and elements of the Puerto Rican history recognizable by the reader.

In El Francotirador the writer presents the world of a lonely man and his (mental) internal crisis,... a spiritually displaced and morally exiled man. This as the others doesn't present a problem without presenting a solution. "Though the end of the novel leaves some questions unanswered, according to its the La Torre, the novelist does not fail to the reader because he is aware the main author-character theme. In some ways the author puts an optimistic note that denotes some faith, trust, to the problem presented in the novel.

The other two novels Figuraciones en El Mes De Marzo and La Renuncia Del Negro Saltazar present elements of political issues. Julia's Saltazar a critical analysis of the political status of the island where the autonomist movement ends up in failure when a revolution is presented.

NIHOMACHI TO TRY TOKYO METHODS OF CRIME PREVENTION

by Mabel Chiu

Violent crime rates are skyrocketing all over the world but not so in Japan, where there has been a gradual decline in criminal activity.

Criminologists have debated the reasons for Japan's uniqueness as far as the low crime rate is concerned. The most common explanation focuses on the close social bonds in Japanese communities. Those who deviate from prescribed community norms and values are socially ostracized or looked down upon.

The Japanese justice system relies upon family and neighborhoods to reinforce their dicisions. The crime rate is low, in other words, because the community actively participates in prevension and works closely with the police department.

In San Francisco, by contrast, the crime rate in Japantown is escalating to the point of being one of the City's major crime centers. Victims are usually tourists unfamiliar with San Francisco but residents of Japantown are increasingly worried about the lack of safety in the area.

§This has led the merchants' association to take a close look at the matter of crime prevention. Where better to look for a successful model than Japan*

One of the major proponents of community crime prevention, Harold Iwamasa, recently returned from Tokyo where he visited and spoke with members of the Metropolitan Police Department. One of the unique thing about the use of an old-fashioned "police box". In Japanese, the police box is called "Koban". These boxes are actually parts of a police station.

"Keishicho," a publication of the Tokyo Metropolitan Police Department explains that "the police station is the 'police unit organized to operate in very close contact with residents in the community". Out of 95 police stations which have several sections and various branches, "there is an average of approximately 13 police boxes (Hashutsusho) or residential police boxes (Chuzaisho) which are located within its precinct".

According to Harold Iwamesa, in San Francisco, the merchants' association of Japantown "has voted to proceed with the construction of the koban. We've contracted an architect to study the construction and equipment needed." After a report from the architectual firm of Van Borg-Nakamura is received, "the committee will meet and make recommendations to the board."

Police boxes in Japan are efficiently run. At each p lice box, approximately 10 foot parrol police officers are assigned and work in four shifts around the clock... A police officer assigned to a police box periodically makes rounds of visits to homes, stores and offices in the specified area of his own responsibility."

San Francisco Public Affairs police Officer Henry Friedlander explained that kobans "are not feasible" in the city because of "the cost factor and no manpower." however, crime prevention experts got together with Japantown hotelkeepers and business people to advise tourists and residents against wandering around the streets. Maps were alos provided since many tourists mistook Japantown for an area close to Golden Gate Park.

Officer Friedlander commented that "anything is possible for the future" but as of now, City police assistance in construction and maintaining a koban is out of the question.

Koban proponents are not deterred. Mr. Iwamasa said that "the merchants' association will be paying the cost as much as possible. Some community funds are available but don'tknow how much or whether we'd be able to get any."

Actual construction of the koban is scheduled for "somewhere around the first month of next year" but before that, Japantown needs "some means of surveillance before the Christmas season and we are going to employ some private (security) officers, beginning around Thanksgiving."

Mr. Iwamasa explained that "the big problem is with communication- how to effectively communicate with those who want help in the areas of Octavia and Gough to Fillmore and Steiner and as far as California and O'Farrel Streets." Van Borg-Nakamura has sent architects to contact vendors and other businesses as well as communications experts to what's best. A koban is definitely in the making.

VAN SERTIMA SPEAKS ON BLACK HISTORY

by Phillip Jennings
Nummo Staff

Ivan Van Sertima, a profound linguist and authority on African history, spoke to a modest crowd Thursday night at campus center. Sertima explained why, at the present day, we are so extremely limited with the history and knowledge of Africa.

Did you know that the first mathematical number system was invented by an African tribe called the Ishango tribe 8,000 years ago* Or that Africans were producing steel 2000 years ago in furnaces reaching temperatures up to 1850 degrees centigrate, and that the Europeans couldn't reach said temperatures until the 1900's* No, of course you didn't.

Were you aware of the fact that there were ruins of an African astronomical observatory with precise alignments of stars which led to the discovery of Sirius B, a white dwarf 700 years ago. Also that Europeans have invented a number of reasons how the Africans could have done something like this.

Robert Temploin, a historian of Great Britain believes that space creatures from Sirius came to earth and gave the "African Savages" this knowledge. Are we expected to believe this bullshit!

American history books tell you that the Wright brothers were the first to fly, but they say nothing of the worlds first glider that was found in Africa, which dated back to 300 years B.C. This glider was put in a museum because it was shaped like a bird and had the paintings of a birds eye on it. It wasn't until NASA examined the craft and found it had a rutter that moved and it had room for passengers that its true identity was known.

Did you know that the first camera in space was invented by a black man* Or the man who will redesign the cockpit of the space shuttle Major Gregory is black*

Many, many things that we know and have today were discovered by people of color, but you never hear of them. Did you know that 84,000 manuscripts written in Arabic which contained much of Africa's ancient history were burnt by the white man*

If you asked your jr. high history teacher about African history he would say "there is no such thing." After Africans were made into slaves, white people conditioned themselves and us, to believe that Africans have never invented anything, have explored no place, or have or never had any kind of technology.

Did you ever wonder how the movies could show Tarzan, the superior man of the cities, come and destroy hundreds of Africans single handedly. It's all a game, the white mans game. They tell themselves that Africans are stupid, inferior to the white race. They relay the message to us and we have heard it so many times that we start to believe it ourselves.

Superior Race* Bullshit again! All men are created equal, there is no superior race! African people have contributed a lot to the world as we know it today. And we have a lot more contributions to make. Remember one thing my brothers and sisters, no matter how much they put us down, or how much they try to discourage our thoughts and our achievements, We are black and we are proud!!!

QUAKER ASSIST KOREA REUNIFICATION

by Max Millard

The Quaker Church, also known as the Society of Friends, has long ben nosed for its activism in social causes. In 1917 the church founded the American Friends Service Committee (AFSC), a humanitarian group to assist victims of war, and those made homeless by strife or oppression. Presently the American Friends Service Committee is working to relieve the plight of refugees in Malaysia, Thailand, Cambodia, and many other countries.

The San Francisco branch of the AFSC was recently briefed on another Asian mission which the group is sponsoring. the church's efforts to bring about a peaceful reconciliation between North and South Korea that would lead to eventual reunification.

"Korea was one country for 1200 years, and has only been divided in the last 35 years," explained David Easter, an ASFC representative who spent the last three years in Tokyo with his wife Maud, also a representative, working on the U.S. relationship to the Korean peninsula. This past September, the Easters and another Quaker delegate made an unprecedented trip to North Korea to discuss the prospects of reunification with the officials. It was the first visit to North Korea by an American organization concerned with public affairs.

"Our job in Japan was to be Korea-watchers," said Easter in a October 31 interview at the AFSC building at 2160 Lake Street. He spent several days in San Francisco en route to other U.S. cities to report on the mission. "When you have the fifth and sixth largest armies in the world facing each other across a demilitarized zone, there's a food chance of an outbreak of [illegible] because the United [illegible] is involved in South Korea, with [illegible] there, are opposed to war and [illegible] the conquest that characterizes Korea and the United States' cooperative history with [illegible]

The United States presently has no official contact with North Korea. "We had the closest contact with South Korea, which [illegible] Russia, which [illegible] North Korea, to explore ways to open up contacts with North Korea," said Easter. "North Korea has made progress [illegible] and has been willing to [illegible] Easter said. "There was no peace [illegible] demonstrations at the college campuses. It's clear that the sentiment is against war again. The education could end all this in Iran, the United States is trying a leader who has a very narrow base of support."

Easter said the [illegible] agreement."

Slow-talking and relaxed, the tallish Quaker spokesman speaks in a tone of even-handness, but seems far more sympathetic to North Korea. His statements include: "If the United States should take its troops out of South Korea, North Korea would pledge to cut their ties to the Soviet Union and China, and would never become a military base for foreign powers." In discussing the riots which took place in Kwangju, South Korea, in May and June this year, Easter said, "Over a thousand people were killed." According to American newspapers, the death toll was closer to 200.

A vocal critic of the new South Korea dictator, Chun Doo Hwan, Easter said that press censorship in that country is now sighter than it was under Park Chung Hee. "The United States should take strong measures to pressure Chun to allow the democratic government to emerge....The united States has very strong leverage that it can use. South Korea is very dependent on loans. if they were held up or stopped, it would put pressure on Chun."

The reason the U.S. government quietly supports Chun's repressive rule, he explained, is that, first, "the Pentagon wants to keep United States military forces in Korea," and second, "because there are 2,000 American companies which do business in South Korea, and among those that have large investments are very large companies like ITT, Dow Chemical, General Motors, and Westinghouse, which sels nuclear power plants to South Korea. They're planning to build 40 over the next 20 years. Westinghouse has contracts ofr [illegible] that are underway."

Does the Quaker spokesman believe that democracy is going to come to South Korea in a way that the United States came to it? "I feel that United States came without a struggle of liberation," replied Easter. "I feel that the way for democracy of those activists and learning political values is [illegible] will turn out to be peaceful. [illegible] have been demonstrations at four college campuses. It's clear that the sentiment is against war again. The education could end all this in Iran, the United States is trying a leader who has a very narrow base of support."

Easter said the [illegible] sends to the American people a message of change. The proposed rules, according to Bell, will be thrown out for the present. Although no time table has been set, he has said that the rules will eventually be rewritten. In the interim, the Office for Civil Rights will continue to enforce the Law Guidelines.

Massachusetts' officials claim Bell's decision will not directly effect the state Transitional Bilingual Education Law. School superintendents, however, at a meeting with Commissioner of Education Gregory Anrig, in December agreed that bilingual education should be one of the first programs to receive budget cuts under Proposition 2 and one half. Last fall, Commissioner Anrig publicly came out against the proposed rules.

Even though government sentiment towards bilingual education is becoming increasingly negative, proponents of bilingual education still number many. According to Vilma Martinez, president of the Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund (MALDEF), "we continue to advocate for understanding of instruction and we believe the best quality program for Mexican Americans is bilingual [illegible] the use of the child's own [illegible] language to teach the child English."

[illegible] Americans, Puerto Ricans, Portuguese, Cape Verdeans, and the hundreds of other linguistic minorities in the U.S., the issue is the same: the right to [illegible] and understandable instruction [illegible] the right to bilingual education. It is only through [illegible] organization, persistence, and cooperation across cultures that we can stop the axe before it has totally fallen.

BILINGUAL ED IN 1981: HAS THE AXE ALREADY FALLEN?

AN EDITORIAL BY CATHERINE E. WALSH

As individuals from a multitude of cultures and languages were celebrating the coming of the new year, school and county officials in Fairfax, Virginia were celebrating a long awaited victory. On December 29, the U.S. Department of Education declared that Fairfax county did not have to teach students in their native language. Although 2,700 limited English speaking students from an estimated 50 different language groups attend Fairfax County schools, school officials maintain that these children can be better taught through intensive English classes than through bilingual education.

The decision marks the end of a five year struggle during which the federal government threatened to withold up to $18 million in funds. According to the Department of Education, the fact that achievement scores of students in the intensive English program "showed consistent and significant progress" was sufficient cause to conclude "that the system's teaching methods were an acceptable alternative to federal requirements based on Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964." Antonio J. Califa, the deputy assistant secretary of education for civil [illegible] stated, "bother has [illegible] that it can be done in other ways."

The Fairfax decision, it seems, was an omen that the worst was yet to come. On February 2nd, the newly appointed Secretary of Education Terrel Bell announced his opposition to Gregory Anrig, state's proposed rules requiring schools to teach limited English-speaking students in their native language and proficient them "English and [illegible]" and an "extension on [illegible] responsibilities."

Bell, with the full support of Reagan, sends to the American people a message of change. The proposed rules, according to Bell, will be thrown out for the present. Although no time table has been set, he has said that the rules will eventually be rewritten. In the interim, the Office for Civil Rights will continue to enforce the Law Guidelines.

Massachusetts' officials claim Bell's decision will not directly effect the state Transitional Bilingual Education Law. School superintendents, however, at a meeting with Commissioner of Education Gregory Anrig, in December agreed that bilingual education should be one of the first programs to receive budget cuts under Proposition 2 and one half. ANGELA BOFILL AT BOWKER

by Gus Martains Nummo Staff

§If there's one thing I've learned in my first two years in the valley, it is that when weather predictions speak of a 10-percent chance of rain, it usually means just that, rain.

§But not even the sloshy weather could have put a damper on the performance of Miss Angela Bofill. While it may have rained the better part of the day, inside Bowker Auditorium it was like an all-expense paid trip to the resort of your choice, made even more ideal by this singing Angel from the South Bronx.

§Backed by a solid five-piece band she opened her show with "The Feeling is Love" from the Angel of the Night album. The mood then went somewhat more upbeat with new material from her soon to be released L.P. on Arista Records.

§She then went into the title cut of her second L.P. Angel of the Night , and the audience applauded with delight upon hearing the first note.

§After a brief exit for a costume change, Angie stormed out with her first big hit, "Under the Moon and Over the Sky". If there is just one complaint about that number, it had to be its brevity. Still there was little to complain about. What was to follow would compensate for any shortcomings.

"Love and Marriage" her most recent original composition had a nice contemporary feel, and the remake of the Stylistics "People make the World go Round", in dedication to New York City, was funkin-for Jamaica, Queens, Harlem and all the other boroughs.

Another new tune was to follow entitled "Follow Your Road". "Share Your Love With The World" was a great opportunity for Miss Bofill to do exactly that. And when she insisted upon some audience participation there was a strong feeling of unity, and if only it was fleeting, it was definitely nice.

For an encore she expressed her affection for children by performing the number she wrote in 1979, the International Year of the Child, "Children of the World".

All in all it was a vacation worth taking.

GWENDOLYN BROOKS SPEAKS AT SMITH COLLEGE

by Gillian Swanson Nummo Staff

§Pulitzer-Prize winning poet Gwendolyn Brooks read selections of her work before a capacity crowd at Smith College last Thursday evening. Mrs. Brooks was sponsored by the college's Black Student Alliance, the Afro-American Studies Department and the Women's Resource Center in celebration of Black History month.

§Mrs. Brooks told the audience that she began writing at the age of seven. According to her mother, she stated, she wrote a number of rhymes from which it became clear that she was destined to become a "lady Paul Laurence Dunbar". Now a phenomenal poet in her own right, Mrs. Brooks offered advice to aspiring writers. "You should tell your truth as you know it", she cautioned the younger poets in the audience. Brooks read from her book, Primer for Young Poets that "poetry is life distilled" and that whatever is of life is the proper subject matter for a poem. She also encouraged aspirant poets to persevere in seeking publication and suggested that they try to publish themselves.

§In keeping with Black History month when, according to Mrs. Brooks, we go to the highest shelf for our Black awareness and take it down for a month, Mrs. Brooks read selections from her book Primer for Blacks . She then read for an hour a collection of her most popular "identity"poems, love poems, children's stories and sonnets spanning her thirty-five year career.

§In response to a question concerning her change in style during those thirty-five years, Mrs. Brooks stated that, "In the old years, I wrote to address myself to a whole world."In 1967 she met a group of young people who believed that Black poetry was by Blacks, about Blacks and to Black people. She also discussed the influence of changing times. "I feel I'll never write another sonnet", she said, "this is not a sonnet time".

Gwendoloyn Brooks latest book, To Disembark is published by Third World Press and will be released in April.

BENEFIT FOR CHILDREN OF ATLANTA

Melville House in Southwest along with the help of Thoreau House, members of the Black Community in Amherst and Pittsfield have gathered together to participate in a benefit for the Black Children of Atlanta and the Black Children of Pittsfield. The talent and fashion show portion of the program will be held from 7 to 10 pm and is dedicated to Black children. The theme of the program will include gospel music by the Reverand Anderson's church choir, music by Mabel Hamilton and Paul Keele both of Pittsfield. Sherief Hall will read poetry and the West Side Community Youth Chorus of Pittsfield will be on hand. Bad Girl Dancers from Pittsfield along with Velma Thomas and Missy Holman from Melville House will also perform. Jalica Battle of Melville House is coordinating the fashion show part of the program. Models will include Mike Battle, Beth Robinson, Beth Wimbish, Maxwell Jones, Grady Fuller, Monique Harris, Marlene Duncan, Carla James and Michele O'Neill.

The children from the black community in Pittsfield have been a special project of Valerie Hamilton , a Melville House Resident Assistant for over a year. Her project called Star Child Affairs, has had the interest of the Third World Professional Network for some time. The Star Child Affairs group of youngsters from the Black Community of Pittsfield made a trip to Umass last September and dj'd the Campus Wide Buddy Program Dance. Plans are to send half of the proceeds of the benefit to the Children of Atlanta program directly to the mayor of Atlanta with special emphasis that the money earned will be used to aide in the investigation of the deaths of the 17 children in Atlanta. Half of the proceeds are earmarked for Star Child Affairs and the Black Children of Pittsfield who are a part of the group Ms. Hamilton began.

To Whom it may concern

Any parents, teachers, students, etc who are concerned about the quality o education in the Amherst area public school system are welcome to explore programs with the recently-founded Multi Cultural Community Education Projec (MCEP).

The Multicultural Community Educator Project (MCEP) was actually conceived by concerned parents and community organizers. Hence, MCEP is designed explicitly to involve and organize parents around grievances, concerns, questions, and interests relating to: 1)Bilingual Programs 2)Multicultural educational programs, and 3)Racism in children's school, also in text books. We avidly invite encourage persons of all ethnic origins to participate. Hence, as a focus, we would like to survey the nature and status of both bilingual and multicultural education programs, and also take up some of the concerns of the Council on Interracial Books for Children, Inc. (CIBC).

The Multicultural Community Education Project (MCEP) is a survey program module that was set-up through a grant from the Haymarket Fund. MCEP will be conducting some workshops, showing some films, and also putting out an informative newsletter.

Any and all people, organizations, and groups interested in anyway in MCEP please contact us as soon as possible to either participate or to be put on our mailing list for future information and newsletters.

WASHINGTON SPEECH:

YULANDA WARD

§The following is a partial transcript of a speech made on January 19, 1981, in Washington, D.C. The speaker is a representative from the Yulanda Ward Memorial Fund. Yulanda Ward was a 22 year old Howard University student who was killed in November of last year. (Part one of a two part series) submitted by the Third World Women's Task Force

§As I look around the church I'm filled with a kind of heartache and bitterness, because the last time I saw this many people in this church we were having a memorial service for Yulanda. (Asks for a moment of silence in remembrance of Yulanda's life) . . . and then I'm going to talk a little bit about why and how she got killed. (Silence.)

§On November 2, 1980, in a working class section of Washington, D.C., right in a section that several housing groups, particularly the City-Wide Housing Coalition, had been organizing in, Yulanda Ward was assassinated. She was assassinated by three white men who put a .357 magnum to her head, blowing off the top of her head, leaving her dead yet her three male companions unharmed. Even though the police and federal officials have tried every tactic in the world to convince the people of this city, and of this nation, that her death was the result of a robbery gone bad, we, because we know the history of their tactics and their efforts to oppress us, know that Yulanda's death was not an accident of robbery but a deliberate political assassination. We are convinced that there is a connection beween Yulanda's death and the work that she was engaged in, in turn support for liberation struggles of her people. It really incenses me to hear the Grenada brother come up and talk about the struggle of the Grenada people, Yulanda came from Houston, Texas. And one of her early organizing efforts was around the struggle for the liberation of Black and Chicano people in Houston, Texas. So I felt that Yulanda was here, in a way, because this brother came from fifteen hundred miles away to talk about the necessitiy to continue a struggle that Yulanda joined when she was twelve years old.

§Massive, brutal acts of murder have been talked about, and have been raised in the press time and time again. But we see a focusing of the acts of murder, and these apparently isolated acts of crime, on specifically Black and oppressed and progressive Third World people in this country. With the election of Ronald Reagan, who ran on an open platform of facism, which is of major significance, we see that the KKK has taken that as their carte blanche to assassinate anybody that they feel does not support what they feel are the objectives of white supremacy.

§The assassination of Yulanda Ward is in keeping with the assassination of Malcolm X, with the attempt to kill (unintelligible from tape) Assata Shakur, and it is in keeping with the era of repression that this country is moving into as we seek to counter the violent oppression that we are suffering. And U.S. capitalism is in crisis. .

. . Because they can't milk and bleed people overseas because the people overseas are fighting for their life and self-determination, they are turning their energies back home again; and they are oppressing us to an even more alarming degree than they are the people overseas. They are oppressing us because they know that they must oppress us because we are the workers, the producers, the exploited, of the vast riches that their ruling class [illegible]

Bathroom violations a point of contention

By STEPHEN M. PORTER
Collegian Correspondent

An attorney with the UMass Legal Service Office yesterday said it does not seem that having coed bathrooms in the University of Massachusetts dormitories is an illegal practice.

Attorney Michael Pill was responding to an official statement by Marjorie Lenn, director of residential life that the coed bathrooms violated the Massachusetts State Plumbing Code established under Chapter 358 of Acts of 1965.

The code refers to bathroom facilities in industrial establishments, foundries, and places where both sexes are employed together, said Pill, who said he was only able to analyze the code briefly.

"I don't think a dorm is an industrial establishment," he said.

Marjorie Lenn, in a recent memo to dormitory staff members stated that all dormitory bathrooms will be turned into single sex facilities at the beginning of the fall semester.

Lenn said esterday that "everybody," who has interpreted the code for the university, including an investigator for the Board of State Examiners of Plumbers, believes the intent of the act prohibits coed facilities in residential areas.

However, Lenn said, the key issue is not the state code, but the "quality of life" in the dorms. Complaints from parents and students who think that male and female students are being forced to share "private space" with each other have been increasing over the years, Lenn said.

The University has never sanctioned coed bathrooms, Lenn said, and the practice of sharing bathrooms should never have been allowed to take hold. It will not cost the University anything to enforce the single sex bathroom policy, said Lenn.

Lenn, who was unaware that Hampshire College has coed bathrooms as well as a coed sauna, said that a survey done in the last couple of years showed that no other institution of a comparable size has coed bathrooms.

While a few dormitory heads of residence and resident assistants seemed to know that the single sex bathroom policy was going to be enforced, most were surprised when they received Lenn's memo.

"There had been no speculation, no rumors. This was totally out of the blue," said Mark Bell, resident assistant on the 16th floor of John Adams Tower in the Southwest Residential Area.

Most head of residences were reluctant to comment on the value and need for the single sex policy. Most said they wanted to attend upcoming staff meeting to be held in various dorms before giving their views.

"We'll all know more in the next week or two," said one Southwest head of residence who declined to give his name.

Bathroom sharing becomes an issue

Most students interviewed yesterday by the Collegian said they were against a recent proposal to change dormitory bathrooms into single sex facilities.

"I'm all in favor of coed bathrooms. People here are mature college students. I don't see any reason to change," said Lance Wallace, an 18 year old freshman resident of James House in Southwest Residential Area.

Karen Brooks, a freshman living in Paterson Dormitory in Southwest.

Cynthia Antonellis; a sophomore commuter.

"It is a good idea. A lot more people will feel more comfortable and have more privacy. When I lived in the dorms, I didn't like it," said Cynthia Anthonellis, a 19-year-old sophomore who now lives off-campus.

"I lived in Central Residential Area and we had separate bathroom. I liked the idea, not so much for people who live there, but for people who visit the dorms. If it is just people you know, it doesn't bother me," said Patricia Tuttle, a 20-year-old junior now living off-campus.

Cheryl Pellegrini, a 22-year-old junior and former resident of McNamara dorm in the Sylvan Residential Area, said: "It has always been coed and it was hard with men. It is a good idea."

Charles Jones, sophomore from Kennedy Tower, Southwest.

"When you have only one bathroom, it is kind of a pain to run down (to another floor) in the morning to take a shower."

has been fine. I don't mind being next to guys. They don't pee."

Freida Tyton, 21, a senior living off campus summed up her disappointment succinctly: "This university is captivating, first with the spring concert, now this," she said.

"There is going to be alot of opposition. If we can get them to forget about it and keep on being a coed, it could die down," said James Whidden, an 18 year old freshman living in Crabtree.

Laura Cameron, 22, a senior living in Lewis, said, "I never use a problem. I'm not going to trek down a flight of stairs to get some water."

But some students agreed with the change, although they were fewer in number.

Union director to speak on safety in the work place

By PAM VICKERY
Collegian Correspondent

Anthony Mazzocchi, corporate Health and Safety Director for the Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers International Union (OCAW) will speak on the topic "Workplace Health and Safety in the 1980's" at 8 p.m. tomorrow at the School of Business Administration. Mazzocchi is a former chemical worker involved in the labor movement for 30 years. He is labor's leading spokesman on injury and disease in the workplace and was instrumental in getting the Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1970 (OSHA) passed.

Under Mazzocchi's direction OCAW's Health and Safety Department has set the pace for the union movement, emphasizing worker education and training and encouraging local initiative in winning the right to know what substances workers are handling.

Mazzocchi's appearance is co-sponsored by the Occupational Studies Program and the Labor Center Student Center. The will be free of admission at 8:00.

Admission is free and sign language interpretation will be provided. ESL (is a wheelchair accessible.

Brezhnev proposes meeting with Reagan

By DAVID MINTHORN
Associated Press

MOSCOW — President Leonid I. Brezhnev, opening the Soviet Communist Party Congress, yesterday proposed a summit meeting with President Reagan to resolve world problems and improve relations between the Soviet Union and the United States.

In a major policy speech greeted by a thunderous ovation, Brezhnev called for resumption of U.S.-Soviet strategic arms negotiations and for limits on submarines and deployment of submarine-based missiles.

Brezhnev said that in the first month of Reagan's presidency "candidly bellicose calls and statements have resounded from Washington, specially designed, as it were, to poison the atmosphere of relations between our two countries."

He said "the acuteness of world problems demanding resolution...dictate the necessity of a dialogue on all levels" between the superpowers. "Experience shows that the crucial link here is meeting at summit level. This was true yesterday and is still true today," he told nearly 5,000 delegates at the Kremlin Palace of Congresses.

Speaking before a huge, white statue of Lenin, the Soviet Union's founder, Brezhnev said "the Soviet Union wants normal relations with the United States."

Brezhnev, 74, who has reportedly suffered several bouts of ill health in recent years, was shown on live television for only 10 minutes, delivering the beginning and end of the long address. He appeared ashen-faced on television at the end.

Except for the 10 minutes, television viewers saw a studio announcer reading the text of a speech that kicked off a weeklong congress that was to endorse Soviet plans for the next five years.

The presentation prompted speculation that Brezhnev and other leaders were not confident he could deliver his entire speech well. One source said he stumbled over some passages before the delegates in the hall.

Kremlin spokesman Leonid Zamyatin claimed afterward that Brezhnev delivered the entire three-hour, 40-minute address from the rostrum with "very good tempo, very good form, with enormous enthusiasm." Foreign reporters were not allowed to cover the session.

At the last party congress in 1976, Brezhnev spoke for five hours, 10 minutes and his entire speech was televised live.

The passages suggesting a U.S.-Soviet summit meeting and new disarmament talks were contained in versions of the speech read on Soviet television and distributed by the official news agency Tass.

Survey reports on monetary success rate

By DEBORAH ASHBRAND
Collegian Staff

University graduating seniors may be comforted by the results of a recent survey of UMass alumni which shows that 1978 and 1979 graduates, earn an annual family income of $17,000.

Those who graduated between 1957 and 1966 have the highest family income, $37,500, indicating that financial rewards increase with experience and age.

Graduadates in 1979 from the departments of chemistry, mathematics, statistics, engineering, marketing, and environmental design all reported a family income of over $30,000. Music department graduates reported the lowest average income of those polled with $14,300.

Approximatley one in four of all the alumni polled said they had been unemployed for periods of six months or more at one time, and 35 percent have earned less than they had expected.

Over 1,000 University alumni were polled on their views in a survey funded by the Office of Development and Alumni Affairs and the Social and Demographic Research Institute (SADRI).

"Many things we asked on the questionnaire were to test out assumptions we were already making," said Dallas Darland, director of the office of Development and Alumni Affairs.

"The Univeristy has never reached out to the alumni to form a network, and we knew we had to draw them back to the University in some way. By and large, our alumni are very interested in academic areas and want to help improve the University in these areas," Darland said.

Graduates in the maths and sciences and business reported an annual income of over $30,000. Music department graduates reported average incomes of $14,300.

Darland said an important finding in the survey is the positive attitude the majority of UMass alumni have toward the University. Fifty-three percent reported they would be willing to help in the career counseling of students, and 30 percent said they would be interested in helping seniors with job placements.

While almost 90 percent reported they were satisfied with their education at UMass, 39 percent rated the counseling and advising at UMass "fair," and 33 percent rated these services "poor".

Darland said two existing counseling programs on campus will be expanded as a result of the survey, and more alumni will be given the opportunity to participate as part-time counselors.

The two programs are the Skills Bank Replacement Program, which allows upperclassmen an opportunity to talk with a UMass alumnus about a specific job or field and the Alumni Admissions Council, which is part of the Admissions Office program. The Council uses UMass alumni to recruit high school students and act as a University liason with individual high schools.

Commuter elections: court action proceeds

By MALCOLM CAMPBELL
Collegian Staff

Court action on the controversial commuter elections of last October continues following a decision by the University of Massachusetts Student Judiciary to allow the case to go to trial. A tribunal last week convened to hear pretrial motions on the status of the case, which involves allegations of improper electoral procedures.

Rejecting motions by the defense for the case's dismissal, the court ruled that a formal hearing be held to determine the validity of the elections as well as the Undergraduate Student Senate actions regarding the elections.

The hearing will be held at an undetermined time this week although a person close to the case said he expects it to be resolved within a week.

"This is going to be a precedent-setting case regardless of its outcome. It will reassert the judiciary as a proper third arm of the (student) government," said Craig Sherwood, advocate for the prosecution.

"The court is being asked to determine whether the actions of the senate were legal or not. If something is illegal, senate debate doesn't remove its illegality," Sherwood said.

The right to judge a senate election is delineated in the constitution, and that right has been assigned to the senate and not to the judiciary, said defense advocate, Joel Weissman, a senator.

"The senate is answerable to the student body, and through elections students control the senate," he said.

"In the past there has been a problem with participation, this is the first time we've had more candidates than seats to be filled. It would be a shame to lose all those good people," he added.

The controversy arose the day of the election when former Attorney General Dana Collier and several other people lodged complaints with the senate Coordinating Committee regarding the manner in which the elections were held citing the fact that candidates were campaigning in the ballot areas and candidates counting the ballots, among other complaints. The committee then moved to invalidate the election, an action which was later reversed by the full senate.

A week after the election, Anthony Gawienowski, then a candidate for a dorm seat, filed a formal complaint with the Attorney General's office. One issue raised by Gawienowski was the placing of political affiliation of some candidates on the ballot.

The senate then decided to hold a referendum under the auspices of the Commuter Collective in which voters were asked whether they would accept the election's results or rather have a new one.

By a 2 to 1 margin commuters decided to let the election stand, but the results of the referendum were for the most part discredited as only about 300 persons voted.

At this point Gawienowski sought to withdraw his complaint and the judiciary consented finding that the proper procedure for withdrawal had been persued. However, some of the co-complaintants, particularly Robert Zimmerman, who signed the petition for judicial action regarding the election, chose to maintain the complaint.

Towards the end of last semester, Collier resigned and Judge Gary Minsky, one of the jurors hearing the case prepared to graduate. The result of this was a temporary injunction which placed a freeze on the case as well as the contested senate seats.

When this semester began, a new tribunal was convened while Zimmerman has filed to withdraw his complaint. At last week's hearing, the court rejected Zimmerman's motion to withdraw. It also ruled that the judiciary does have jurisdiction in this case.

'Outlaws' leave audience exhausted and satisfied

By SHERYL SENTER
Collegian Staff

Well primed by the opening act of Doc Holiday, a Blue Wall bar audience went wild when the Outlaws came on stage, kicking off the concert with "Stick Around for Rock and Roll."

The Outlaws — with Hughie Thomasson, Billy Jones and Freddie Salem on guitar and vocals; both from Hurry Sundown. Then The Outlaws tore into "Devils Road" and "Angels Hide," tunes from their latest album Ghost Riders.

Sizzling with energy, the audience exploded when The Outlaws played "Ghost Riders in the Sky," the title cut of their latest album. The group got the same reaction when Thomasson changed his guitar, using a Stratocaster for the tune, and doing the group's performances of "Water hole", from its' first album Outlaws and "There Goes Another Love Song," also from Outlaws.

Screaming for more during a long wait, the audience was well rewarded when The Outlaws encored with a rip it up style 25 minute rendition of "Green Grass and High Tides," filled with fantastic solos by Thomasson, Jones and Salem.

The high energy impact of The Outlaws as well as the group's recorded music has lead them to be one of the country's very top rock attractions.

The Outlaws, clad in Levi jeans, t-shirts and cowboy boots — with the exception of Billy Jones who reserved the right to wear a Hawaiin print shirt — aim to please, and that's exactly what they did Sunday night leaving the audience exhausted and very satisfied.

Coed bathrooms

After more than 10 years of coed dormitory living here at the University of Massachusetts, it has been decided that dormitory bathrooms must be restricted by sex.

The announcement, issued in a memorandum from the Office of Residential Life, calls for the elimination of coed bathrooms in all residence halls. Students living on floors with only one facility may be required to travel up or down one flight of stairs, to find a facility open for their use. Guests of the opposite sex visiting a single-sex dormitory would only be allowed use of the lobby facility.

This plan is both ludicrous and untenable.

A major concern of residents and residential staff is the issue of enforcement. It is unrealistic to expect staff members, in addition to their other duties, to monitor the bathrooms to ensure the implementation of this plan. No student should be required to climb a flight of stairs to get to the bathroom in what serves as a home; and no student visiting a member of the opposite sex should be inconvenienced by having to travel to the lobby facilities.

Are the respective area judicial boards to be flooded with offenders?

The ramifications of this plan suggest that the floors in dormitories having only one bathroom per floor will eventually become single-sex because of the inconvenience incurred.

The advent of coed living at UMass came from student sentiment that it would be a positive experience and it has become an integral and valuable facet of University life. The Office of Residential Life has made the assumption that student opinion has changed.

That there has been no student involvement in this decision raises skepticism on the validity of both the process and the plan itself.

Each student entering the residence hall system has the option of choosing single-sex or coed living arrangements. This is specified both during orientation and on the Housing Preference form. Even if students move into a coed dorm unaware of their options, the University will make every effort to place those students into single-sex dormitories.

The argument that more and more students do not wish to be placed in coed dormitories is a weak excuse for such a bold measure. If there is truly a need for more single-sex living space, more should be created. In a residential system offering 53 dormitories with a wide realm of living alternatives, careful planning would enable students to live in various situations, be they coed by room, by floor, or single-sex.

Instead, the Office of Residential Life has taken the issue to a severe extreme, really calling for a plan while failing to examine possible options or consider the opinions of those who it most affects — the students who will have to live by these rules.

Letters

You need more than expression

This is in response to the February 13 column by Bob Cesbo.

I am an engineering student and was extremely annoyed by his sexist, profane expression of the age-outlived concept of the engineering student. To quote: "They can't write, they ain't creative...they sit around and multiply right angles all day." He went on to infer that engineers should feel guilty for making substantial salaries. The crux of the article was a statement of his opinion on the fact that, as a minority major, he doesn't "mesh" any values.

I sympathize with him on that matter; however, that does not give him the right to ridicule what is probably the hardest working class of students in the university. To him I say, (if you want money in this life you need to have something valuable to offer. Being able to express yourself simply is not enough in today's society, in many cases.

He further ridiculed us as being uncreative in general. This is totally ridiculous as engineering is the basis for innovation.

In reference to his comments about the writing ability of the engineering student, I'd like to say that technical writing is highly emphasized in my department (mechanical engineering). I say that his opinion is based on ignorance. As for the statement that the engineers want to commit suicide because they are faceless, I say that it wouldn't consider a single guy with a successful and well-paying career to be faceless. I'd be willing to bet that he would gladly trade places with a good number of engineers.

His belief of "calculator punchers" strikes me as very ignorant. Bob, I'll give you my calculator and you go design a car for me, okay? Oh! it is on a BOT 300 lecture and tell me if you think the instructor doesn't have an good knowledge of the English language as you do.

There is hope for you yet, however. Maybe you will meet a nice tall member of the society of Women Engineers and your many problems will be solved.

Segregated newspapers don't help

Coming from a small school where enrollment consisted of 50 percent black students and 50 percent white students, I find it odd that a large and open-minded institution such as UMass has a separate "Third World section in the school publication. I always thought a university newspaper should cater to one and all of its students. I get the impression from the tone of some of the articles that instead of trying to resolve interracial conflicts, segregated newspapers only lead to more resentment, which drives the black and white students further away from one another.

Drugs and tanks don't mix

First I would like to thank Ed Levine for his accurate and articulate posting of my experiences with isolation tanks in chapter 2(A). One point needs clarification, however.

If I said that I knew of "no one who has combined the tank experience with hallucinogenic drugs and experienced anything unusual," what I should have said was that I personally know of no one who has combined hallucinogens (magic mushrooms, peyote, LSD) with the tank and "flipped out."

There is nothing usual about drug-induced altered states. Hallucinogens in particular trigger profound changes in consciousness and I would not recommend their use to anyone in combination with an isolation tank. Dr. John Lilly, who developed the isolation tank in 1954 in order to study the effects of sensory deprivation on consciousness, wrote about his experiences with LSD 25 and isolation tanks in the center of the Caribbean and subsequent books. Anyone who thinks that using LSD and going into an isolation tank might be a fun way to pass a Sunday afternoon should read this book first.

In my view, certain drugs, used conscientiously, can serve to enhance inner experience normally hidden from our awareness. Similarly, sometimes use of an isolation tank can bring to awareness the unconscious energies of an individual, and do so without whatever extra energy may associate with "foreign substances." Combining the two, however, is unnecessary and potentially dangerous.

By the way, persons wishing to rent an isolation tank previously existing since 1974 or 1975 can locate one in Amherst where this is possible are generally required to sign a release form which rules out drug use of any kind.

Overenrollment should be dealt with

There is a serious problem concerning the large number of students needing various business courses, and the lack of spaces.

Every semester since I have attended this university I have been denied the business courses I am required to take. Only through persistence and hours of wasted time have people been able to get some of the courses necessary to graduate. Not only do business majors need classes in the school of Business Administration, but Fashion Marketing and Hotel, Restaurant and Travel Administration majors need these courses also. The problem of overenrollment should be dealt with so that required courses can be given to those who so desperately need them.

Association to organize lobbying effort

A meeting attempting to build a grass roots student faculty and administrative group will be held at 8:15 tonight in the Campus Center 911.

The meeting, sponsored by the Commonwealth Association of United Students for Education (CAUSE), interested in the growth and direction of the University of Massachusetts and the shape of public higher education in general, CAUSE president Ronald Keefe Jr. said.

The purpose of the group is to bring about greater communication and cooperation between students, faculty and administrators, Keefe said. The group will attempt to bring together concerned community members and bolster legislative lobbying efforts by UMass students.

Festival features 'The Fixer' tonight

Movies, plays, and musical performances mark the remainder of the Jewish Arts Festival, running through March 16. Most events are free and all are open to the public.

The festival, which began the first week of the semester, will feature the film, "The Fixer" tonight at 8 p.m. in Thompson 104.

Also, the Barking Rooster Theater will perform "The Marano" at Hampshire College, at 8 p.m. Phone the UMass Hillel.

On Friday there will be a Musical Shabbat Service in Room 310 at 7 p.m. in the Student Union with Neil Ram, a visiting professor in Civil Engineering at UMass. The Voice of the Turtle, a group of musicians, will perform a musical heritage of Sephardic Jewry Saturday, 8 p.m. at Amherst College in Johnson Chapel. The musicians will also speak about the Sephardic people's cultural history.

Marceau enthralls audience

By ROB HUFFMAN
Collegian Staff

During the two-hour show that Marcel Marceau gave at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall Saturday, he gently guided the thoroughly-enthralled audience through the possibilities of human emotion.

"Amusement Park," the evening's first pantomime, was an appropriate opener, as he exhibited the staggering variety of people and situations that he is able to portray.

Standing confidently in the spotlight, his face painted white, and his garb like a clown's sailor suit, he began turning steadily and gracefully. As he turned around, he imitated different movements each time that he faced front. He would play an accordian, a flute, or be a child riding on a merry-go-round.

As the sketch developed, Marceau became two old ladies having a conversation, a man blowing up a balloon, and with flawless precision played a person running through a maze. This maze found Marceau boxed-in center stage, once again turning in the manner which began this sketch. The musicians and the child on the merry go-round were back, and with elegant symmetry Marceau had prepared the hall for the dozen pantomimes that were to follow.

Highlights of the second set included "The Dress," which was a sentimental and at times melodramatic piece, and "The Tree," the most abstract, and also the most serious work of the evening. "The Tree" was accompanied by recorded music and battle sounds, and closed the first set with a decidedly somber feeling.

The second half was all fun, though, as this portion of the show was devoted to Marceau's character "Bip", the lovable loser who stumbles through situations as diverse as being a matador, and trying to commit suicide.

If "Bip" reminds one of Charlie Chaplin's "Little Tramp," it's not without reason. Silent films were a tremendous influence on the legendary French pantomimist.

Marceau has an advantage over Charlie Chaplin and Buster Keaton, though, for his art is entirely devoid of props. Save a hat and a screen to duck behind, Marceau is alone in the spotlight; his body, hands, and face are all he has to express himself. This lack of objects to describe actions make it possible for him to subtly shift his magic movements.

For example, as a painter, Marceau brushes with bigger and bigger strokes and somehow begins soothing the strings of a violin. Two thousand people are hushed, straining in unison to hear the unseen Stradivarius that Marceau frees so sincerely with his left hand, and loves so precisely, then passionately with his right.

Throughout these movements, and in all Marceau's piece's he conveys above all an understanding, compassion, and love for people and their behavior. Saturday's was a show not to be forgotten.

THE MINI STORE

WHY?

★ In a survey last spring, 73% of the students who answered said they didn't want the candy counter renovated. Yet the administration went ahead anyway.-It's clear that the administration can't prioritize money for our building in our best interest.

★ We must keep the administration from getting away with this blatant disregard of student opinion if we are to prevent this from happening again.

★ We must show that we are seriously opposed to the Mini-Store if our demands of student control are to be taken seriously.

Successful Careers Don't Just Happen

At the Institute for Paralegal Training we have prepared over 4,000 college graduates for careers in law, business and finance. After just three months of intensive training, we will place you in a stimulating and challenging position that offers professional growth and expanding career opportunities. As a Legal Assistant you will do work traditionally performed by attorneys and other professionals in law firms, corporations, banks, government agencies and insurance companies. Furthermore, you will earn graduate credit towards a Master of Arts in Legal Studies through Antioch School of Law for all course work completed at The Institute.

We are regarded as the nation's finest and most prestigious program for training legal specialists for law firms, business and finance. But, as important as our academic quality is our placement result. The Institute's placement service will find you a job in the city of your choice. If not, you will be eligible for a substantial tuition refund.

If you are a senior in high academic standing and looking for the most practical way to begin your career, contact your Placement Office for an interview with our representative.

Eldridge to be honored tonight

They will gather tonight, friends big and small, to honor a man they called Boob.

Boston Celtics guard Nate "Tiny" Archibald headlines the list of expected guests for tonight's tribute to the late UMass basketball star Alex Eldridge, who died last June in New York, his hometown, at the age of 24.

The tribute, a 10 - 15 minute program before tonight's UMass-Pitt game at the Cage, is being sponsored by friends of Eldrige, the high school All-America guard from Taft High School in New York who came to UMass in 1974 and played 102 games for the Minutemen over his four years, setting every major assist record here.

Scheduled guests for tonight's tribute include former UMass captain Derick Claiborne, who was Eldridge's backcourt partner and friend for several years here; Mark Donoghue, who captained both the 1975—76 and 1976—77 Minutemen teams; Eric Williams, captain of the 1978—79 team, and Brad Johnson, both former teammates of Eldridge.

Tony Price, Eldridge's old schoolyard buddy and perhaps his best friend, is also expected. Price, who carried Penn to the NCAA semi—finals against Magic Johnson and Michigan St. in 1979, played briefly for the San Diego Clippers of the National Basketbal Association.

Eldridge's mother, Elizabeth, is also scheduled to be present for the tribute to her son.

Eldridge, who is the only player in UMass history to be the seasonal leader in a statistical category (assists) for four straight years, died of cardiomyopathy, an acute or chronic disorder of the heart muscle.

The late Alex Eldridge, shown as a freshman (above), and as a senior (left), will be honored before tonight's Pitt-UMass game. (Photos courtesy of Peter Weinberg)

Hoopmen make final season appearance at Cage

By KEVIN CULLEN
Collegian Staff

And, so, it is over.

The University of Massachusetts men's basketball team will play their final home and Eastern Eight game tonight when they taken on the surging Pitt Panthers, 7:30, at the Cage.

With a final non-league game scheduled for Thursday in New Hampshire, the Minutemen (3-21 overall, 0-12 Eastern Eight) have come to the end of a season which has been one of frustration and rebuilding.

The Panthers (14-10) are coming off an 81-64 dismantling of league-leader West Virginia down at the Fitzgerald Field House. Pitt is now fourth in the Eastern Eight with a 7-4 league record.

UMass, meanwhile, will hope a large Cage crowd will turn out for the home finale and display the same kind of momentum-changing noise that marked the Minutemen's 61-56 loss to Boston University at the Cage last week.

UMass will have to deal with a revitalized Pitt, led by a revitalized Sam Clancy. Clancy, a 6'6", 225 lb., forward who is built like a linebacker and rebounds like one, is one of the dominating players in Eastern basketball. Billed as one of the league's stars, Clancy got off to a quiet start, shifted from the center to forward position, where his point production has finally picked up.

Always a fearsome rebounder, Mr. Clancy leads head coach Dr. Roy Chipman's Panthers in the boards dept., as usual, but some recent 20-point efforts have boosted his scoring average to 16.3, among the top in the Eastern Eight.

Carlton Neverson, a 6'5" swingman who did the majority of damage in an 85-65 Pitt win against UMass earlier this season, has been averaging nearly 15 points, while junior guard Dwayne Wallace, who runs the team, has averaged 10.8 points and nearly five assists per game, giving the Panthers a solid backcourt.

Senior forward Lennie McMillan complements the brawn of Clancy up front, while averaging 9.3 points per game.

Starting center Paul Hrcovich, a 6'9" sophomore, sprained an ankle in the West Virginia game and will not make the trip. The starting center spot will go to either 6'9" Steve Beatty or 6'11" Ed Schenermann, who is probably the best of the three, but has been hampered by injuries all season.

In that earlier encounter, Dec. 23 in Pittsburgh, UMass played one of their better halves this season, trailing by just a basket 33-31, at the half, before McMillan and Neverson teamed up to turn the contest into a 20-point spread. Clancy was held to just three points in that game, and it would take more than good defense to hold Mr. Clancy to do that again.

Gymmen edge E. Stroudsberg

ELIZABETH McGOWAN
Collegian Staff

1.15 is a slim margin, but proved to be enough to get the University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team back on the winning track. UMass slipped by East Stroudsburg State College 243.85-242.70 on Saturday afternoon. Their overall record now stands at 7-2

"We went down there without our best team," said UMass senior gymman, Steve Craig. "They were a better team than we anticipated."

Although the Minutemen lost the first event, the floor exercises, by a 45.15-45.00 score, four performers turned in high personal scored of the season.

Craig won the event with a 9.4 while teammates John Macurey and Jim McGrath placed fourth and fifth in the event.

Bob Gauthier's 8.85 performance on the peerrel horse was good enough for a second place finish and also put UMass in the lead by 0.55 of a point.

After the still ring competition, East Stroudsburg regained the lead. A 9.2 score by UMass's steady performer, John McGeragle, gave him a first place tie with Stroudsburg's Nick Pinardo.

UMass coach, Roy Johnson was surprised at the close of the meet. "They (E. Stroudsburg) have really improved over the last year. We took a weaker team there so as to give other team members a chance to compete."

E. Stroudsburg won the long-horse vaulting event, but only by 0.80 of a point. Minutemen Craig and McGrath placed in the top five, both gathering 9.15 scores.

Neither team scored well on the parallel bars, but it was the turning point for the UMass gymmen. They edged their opponents 35.25-33.00 in that event and gained an overall lead of 0.40 of a point. Top performer was Bob Gaulart, scoring a personal high of 8.45.

UMass lost the horizontal bar competition, the last event, but still managed to hold the lead and win the meet. Junior John Nelson tied his personal high on the bar with a 9.1 and co-captain Tommy Thomson placed fifth with an 8.7 performance.

All around competitors for UMass were Thomson, Freshman Bert Mathieson, Macurey and Gauthier. Gauthier's 51.25 score was the high for the day while E. Stroudsburg's Poloperam and Franklin Winstead took second and third places.

UMass will meet Temple this Saturday at 8:00 in Boyden Auxiliary Gym.

Wildcats rip gymwomen

By MARY SZETELA
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts womens' gymnastic team was handed its second loss of the season in nine meets from a talented University of New Hampshire team Sunday at Durham.

The Minutewomen were outscored 135.5 to 127.55 but UMass coach Virginia Evans is still optimistic.

"Sunday's meet is not representative of our season so far, Evans said. Hopefully we'll recoup and make it to the Easterns." The Eastern Championship will be held at the University of Pittsburgh March 27-28.

The vaulting event proved to be one of the few highlights of the day for UMass. They scored their highest team score of the season a 33.9. Also, Robin Low had her highest score of the year on the uneven bars, 8.8.

The score at the end of the first two events was 69.2 to 66.3, but the Minutewomen tallied their lowest score of the year on the balance beam, an event which has given UMass problems all season.

Due to the low scoring on the bears, UMass had lost too many points which couldn't be gained back.

Karen Clemente shined on the floor exercise, scoring an 8.45 and placing third behind UNH's Lucia Cancelmo and Jane Dean, respectively.

The University of Massachusetts men's gymnastic team will host their first meet since intersession this Saturday at Boyden Gymnasium when they take on Temple University.

New co-op forms to sell newspapers

By GREG VOLPE
Collegian Staff

Amidst a student boycott and legal complaint filed is Hampshire County Superior Court against the recently constructed Student Union mini-store, a new student co-op has formed to begin selling alternative newspapers to University of Massachusetts students.

The new student organization, call the Ohio News Service Co-operative, is presently set up in the lobby of the Student Union Building and will be selling, in addition to regularly bought papers, newspapers not available at either the University Store of the new mini-store, said Leslie Jennings, head of the co-op.

Although Jennings claims the news stand is independent of the present on-going student boycott against the mini-store, Arvid Muller, student coordinator for the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) and boycot organizer, said the boycott is working in "conjunction" with the co-op.

Muller said the student senate allocated $1,000 for the operation of the news stand last Wednesday, after the boycott had initially began.

Jennings, who said the stand will become a permanent fixture in the Student Union's Commonwealth Room in two weeks, said the co-op will be working with distributors in Springfield, Holyoke and Boston to make available to UMass student a wide variety of newspapers.

Among the assortment of papers sold at the news stand, Jennings said, will be the Los Angeles Times, Washington Post, Daily World, Le Monde, and many Spanish-speaking newspapers. In addition, the co-op will supply the Boston Globe, New York Times and other papers already found on campus.

SCERA, along with the Undergraduate Student Senate, called for a student boycott of the $47,000 Mini Store because of their anger at the Campus Center administration for approving of the renovations even after the Board of Governors had apparently voted against them in December, 1980.

At present, SCERA, through its boycott, is demanding the store be made accessible to handicapped students; that students have control over all revenues and general operation of the Mini Store; and , in the future, all renovations in the Campus Center and Student Union be approved by the Graduate and Undergraduate Student Senates.

Guzzi to present budget

By DEBORAH ASBRAND
Collegian Staff

Board of Regents Chief Administrative Officer Paul Guzzi will address the State House of Representatives Ways and Means Committee today and present the Regents' budget recommendations for higher education for fiscal year 1982.

Guzzi, former Massachusetts Secretary of State, will give the Regents' view of the $360 million proposed budget for the coming year.

A total budget of $81.1 million has been earmarked for the University of Massachusetts at Amherst by Gov. Edward J. King, a decrease of $605,988 from this year's budget.

The proposed figure for fiscal year 82' from campus officials was $90 million, which included an inflationary increase of $2.9 million based on the governor's guidelines. An additional increase of at least $2.54 million is necessary to maintain the Amherst campus with no major improvements or changes, according to Marie McDermmond, director of the Office of Planning and Budget.

If no additional funds are allocated to the University, plans for the improvement of campus lighting, the basic math skills program, and several other programs will have to be discarded, McDermmond said.

Kenneth Moore, chairman of the Undergraduate Student Senate Public Policy Committee, will also testify at today's hearing at 10:30 a.m. at the statehouse, on the proposed budget cuts, focusing on the areas of graduate and equipment funds, both of which will heavily effect UMass undergraduates, Moore said.

MASSPIRG meeting draws support

By JOSEPH BARRETT
Collegian Staff

The student lobbying group MASSPIRG discussed its goals and issues for the year is an organizational meeting in the Campus Center last night. About eighty people attended.

Susan Birmingham, Organizational Director for the state, said that one of the major issues they were focusing on was the Bottle Bill. "Governor King vetoed the bill last year, and effectively killed it by bottling it up in committees last year," said Birmingham.

Birmingham said "We want to make this an issue again this year by working through the legislators in their districts. By demonstrating public support for the bill, hopefully we can force legislators who have historically been against the bill into voting the way their constituents fee.," said Birmingham.

Birmingham noted that consumer advocates of the bill were outspent by industry 40 to 1 in the 1976 campaign, yet lost in the statewide referendum by only .3 percent. Birmingham characterized this type of outspending on consumer issues by corporations as "obscene."

Rich Van Heyningen, also with MASSPIRG, spoke about another issue of MASSPIRG, that of the useless drugs on the market. "The Health Research Group, an organization affiliated with Ralph Nader, recently determined in their book, Pills that Don't Work, that there are over 610 drugs on the market sold by prescription that just don't do what they were intended to do, and these often have dangerous side effects," Van Heyningen said.

Van Heyningen explained that little research is spent in this country on drug research itself outside of the pharmaceutical industry. The major watchdog for this industry, the FDA (Food and Drug Administration), knows about these claims, yet the drugs remain on the market, according to Heyningen. There were a total of 46.5 million prescriptions for these drugs in 1979 alone, with a total of 1.3 billion dollars being spent on them, according to Paula Dudek.

Birmingham said MASSPIRG also wants to make corporations legally responsible for their hazardous wastes, instead of leaving the state to clean up. Birmingham emphasized the need for this, saying "20 percent of the well-water in the state is already contaminated; we can't wait on this issue."

Mary Bailey spoke about recycling oil to save energy and reduce hazardous waste. "If we could make retailers realize that they are responsible, legally, to collect used oil that they sell, and prove to them that this would be beneficial for them and the environment, then we would be succeeding."

Birmingham said used oil alone accounts for 16 percent of the hazardous wastes, and this contained high levels of lead, magnesium, zinc and phosphorous.

Kevin Bowe spoke about the goal of getting public financing of political campaigns. "The Ward Commission, which investigated the building scandals in the state, recommended public financing, and what we're trying to do is give them more ammunition towards that end." Bowe said that their strategy called for "investigating who contracted who for what, and how much; we want to relate this information to voting records, committee position, district work, etc."

Bowe said that "we're not out to get anyone, we just want to demonstrate the need fer public financing." He said that MASSPIRG backed the two dollar income tax checkoff for this purpose. Bowe also pointed to Tilson Farm, the Library and the Campus Center at UMass as examples of incompetent building by state contractors.

A consumer guide for housing, car repair and unfair pricing in the Amherst/Hadley area was also being worked on, and was projected to be out by the end of the semester, said Bruce Heiseth.

Todd Clark said that MASSPIRG was also trying to force radio and television stations to comply with the Fairness Doctrine, saying this would apply to those stations that had aired pro-nuclear spots in the past. "People seem so enthusiastic from this meeting," said Clark.

House to reshape Reagan's economic plan

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — House Democrats on yesterday rejected as "jelly-bean talk" President Reagan's claims for his economic program, and vowed his tax-cut plans will be reshaped by Congress.

"The legislation we fashion will be our product," Rep. Dan Rostenkowski, D-Ill., chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, told Treasury Secretary Donald T. Regan. "The way certain tax cuts (proposed by the president) are structured are sure to be changed."

Regan listened calmly to Rostenkowski's statement and to a characterization by Rep. J.J. Pickle, D-Texas, of the administration's economic forecasts as "jelly bean talk."

But he bristled when Rep. Tom Downey, D-N.Y., charged that the program is supported only by "hallucinogenic" and "threadbare evidence."

"I resent that," Regan retorted.

The president predicts his economic program would cut inflation in half and create 10 million jobs by 1986. Many private economists consider that forecast overly optimistic.

Reagan's plan for a 30 percent reduction in individual tax rates over three years is under attack because few of the benefits would go directly to low-income Americans, and for fear that a commitment now to a long-term tax cut would worsen inflation.

In the Senate, meanwhile, work began on Reagan's plans to slash federal spending. Leaders of the Budget Committee introduced a resolution calling for $125.9 billion in spending cuts — Reagan's target — over the next three years.

Reagan's economic program won an endorsement in principle from the nation's governors, so long as it is accompanied by reduced federal red tape and does not deprive the poor or shift the cost of essential programs to state and local governments.

In other economic developments:

—Three senators introduced — with Reagan's support, they said — a bill that would allow eventually an income-tax reduction of up to $500 for each student in college, vocational school or private school. This is the same tuition tax credit that was opposed by the Carter administration and previously rejected by Congress.

A Senate aide estimated the cost of the credit at $6 billion a year when fully in effect.

—Lyle Gramley, a member of the Federal Reserve Board, said Americans should be prepared for the possibility that the Reagan program won't produce results as quickly as the president's aides predict.

Former Amherst dean dies

AMHERST, (AP) — Eugene S. Wilson, dean of admissions at Amherst College from 1946 until he retired in 1972, died at his home in Amherst yesterday after a long illness. He was 75.

"Perhaps no other college admission officer exerted as much influence on admission standards and concepts as he did after World War II," Amherst College said in announcing his death.

The college said Wilson accepted the position on condition the college would set no racial or other quotas for entering classes. "Under his administration, the student body became widely diverse, and Amherst became one of the most sought after colleges in the country," Amherst said.

A spokesman estimated that Wilson admitted 6,000 students while dean.

Wilson was born in St. Louis, Mo., the son of an Amherst graduate. Wilson prepared for college at Deerfield and was graduated from Amherst in 1929. At college, he was active in athletics and student government and was a member of Psi Upsilon fraternity.

He was associated with a steamship company in Philadelphia for 10 years after graduating, and then returned to Amherst as secretary of the alumni council and the board of trustees. He later served as editor of the alumni magazine and director of placement and taught English during World War II.

Overthrow flops rebels surrender

MADRID, Spain (AP) — Denounced by their king and most military commanders, rebel officers surrendered yesterday after holding government leaders and members of Parliament hostage for 18 hours in a dramatic attempt to overthrow Spain's fledgling democracy.

Lt. Col. Antonio Tejero Molina of the paramilitary Civil Guard gave up the coup attempt at noon after a night-long standoff. Deserted by many of the 200 men who had stormed the ornate Spanish Cortes (Parliament), he agreed to formally surrender — symbolically in the former office of Spain's late dictator Generalissimo Francisco Franco.

Student senate fights to increase funding

By MALCOLM CAMPBELL
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts Undergraduate Student Senate Co-coordinating Committee met yesterday afternoon to discuss policy and establish an agenda of issues to be debated at the full senate assembly being held tonight.

Today, the budget for Massachusetts public higher education is going before the state House Ways and Means Committee. The student senate has prepared a strategy of extensive lobbying of legislators in an attempt to increase the amount of funding earmarked for higher education, said senate speaker Linda Geary.

"We plan to develop a personal relationship with state legislators so that they don't view UMass as only a big block of concrete," Geary said, adding legislators need to realize that there are students who think UMass is a quality school deserving greater fiscal support.

In addition to the budget, Senate bill 324 is scheduled to go before a joint committee of the state House and Senate today. The bill, if passed, will authorize a student from any of the state's public colleges or universities to sit on the Board of Regents, formed by Governor Edward J. King's recent reorganization of higher education.

Geary said student leaders plan to push for the bill's passage, but said there is a mixed bag of support.

"Two regents are in favor or a student representative to the board, but there is some strong opposition. University President David Knapp is against it. So is Chancellor (Henry) Koffler," Geary said. "My own estimation is that they are only giving us this problem to play around with, to keep us busy. Yet, the effect has been to unite students across the state in support of its passage."

The Coordinating Committee also discussed further action opposing the construction and operation of the new Student Union Building mini-store.

"We need people there (outside the counter) to tell the students what is at issue—what happened," said student Senator Chip Nealy, a Coordinating Committee member. There will be a meeting and a rally this Friday to protest the store, he said.

In other business, the committee looked at the Faculty Senate's proposal to change the pass-fail option. If the faculty has their way, any student receiving a CD or a D grade in a pass-fail course would have the grade placed on his transcript and averaged into his cum. The student senate is adamantly opposed to this measure and seeks to maintain the present system, Geary said.

"Right now the issue is on hold but it will come up by early April," Geary said. The benefit of the present system is that it allows students to experiment and take courses they find interesting, but difficult. It does not penalize the student for diversifying, she said.

CAUSE informs students of possible budget cuts

By KATHLEEN HOWLEY
Collegian Staff

The Commonwealth Association of United Students for Education (CAUSE) will distribute leaflets today in the Student Union Building to educate students about possible cutbacks in the UMass budget. The budget will be the subject of hearings before the House Ways and Means Committee in Boston today.

According to the leaflets a $19 million budgetary increase would be needed to keep up with a 13 percent inflation rate, yet legislators are considering cutting the budget by $600,000. This, the leaflets say, will result in overcrowded classes, cutbacks in special programs and athletics and the loss of quality professors.

Because there are no student representatives on the Board of Regents, the leaflets call these budgetary cutbacks "taxation without representation."

CAUSE, a state-wide student organization formed last semester, is asking students to call their legislators toll-free from the student senate offices, located in room, 420 of the Student Union Building, to lobby against the cutbacks.

CAUSE met last night in the Campus Center to design the leaflets and discuss strategy. Bernie Goulding, president of the UMass chapter of CAUSE, said that organization's efforts would be directed at making UMass "a quality institution that people can afford to go to."

"It's an important organization," Goulding said. "It gives the students a voice and represents them before the people who decide how the system is run."

CAUSE is also concerned with tuition hikes, financial aid cutbacks and the lack of student representation on the Board of Regents.

CAUSE will meet again next Tuesday night at 6:00 p.m. in the Campus Center.

"We used to test babies as if they were lab animals. We are now beginning to look at them as if they are persons in an interacting environment," said noted pediatrician T. Berry Brazelton, to a capacity crowd in Mahar Auditorium last night.

Brazelton, practicing pediatrician for 28 years in Cambridge, Mass. is the author of three books, "Infants and Mothers," "Toddlers and Parents," and a newly released book. "On Becoming a Family."

In his talk entitled "Do Newborn Babies Shape Their Parents" Brazelton stressed the importance of creating a warm nurturing environment for a newborn baby. "A parent must envelope a newborn baby so he can learn what's out there," he said.

Brazelton said parents can find support for themselves in their baby. He said parents do this by creating an interacting system in which they set up a responsive pathway. In so doing, Brazelton said the parents will learn about themselves and their babies.

Brazelton demonstrated the importance of establishing the nurturing environment with two films.

In the first film Brazelton cuddled and spoke to a two-day-old baby. The baby's eyes followed Brazelton's head as it moved from side to side and reacted to his voice by turning to meet Brazelton's face. "They are still teaching at the Harvard Medical School that babies don't hear for the first ten days," Brazelton said.

In the second film Brazelton demonstrated the changes that occur in a three-month-old baby's facial and body movements when a support system is taken away. A mother speaks to her baby in a soft, rhythmic voice, and reaches out to touch the baby. The baby responds by laughing and rubbing his hands and feet against each other. The mother then changes her behavior. She sits before the baby motionless. She does not smile. The baby's facial movements and body reactions are different. The baby looks bewildered and sad. His body movements are now jerky.

He said these examples demonstrate that a newborn baby is a person who is very much aware of his mother's interaction with him. Brazelton said he has a real desire to back up people in this generation. He said there have been many changes in child care and this has made people aware that they have many choices.

Brazelton said the turmoil that parents experience before the birth of their child performs a major job. "The emotional dredging up produces an "alarm sensitive." This makes it an enormous opportunity for the parents to scan their baby, to get to know the baby better, Brazelton said.

Rhetoric exemption test offered

The rhetoric exemption exam offered each semester will be given next Wednesday from 7 to 9 p.m. in Mahar Auditorium. Students will be required to write a 500 word essay on a topic of current interest. The department asks that students bring a pen, 50 cents and I.D.

The majority of University students are required to take six credits worth of rhetoric to satisfy the B-core curriculum requirement. The beginning of each semester at UMass is often characterized by long add/drop lines, particularly in required subjects such as rhetoric. The exemption exams have also been crowded in the past. More information about the exam and the requirements is available from the department, housed in 305 Bartlett.

Angela Bofill A Human Angel

By KAREN MARIE THOMAS

"I used to take the 101 bus in New York to school downtown. Everything above 96th St. was all funky and everybody's black and Puerto Rican, pass 96th St., everybody's all sparkly and white. How come we can't get together?" asked jazz-vocalist Angela Bofill.

Bofill appeared in concert at Bowker Auditorium, Friday evening. Her music, a mixture of jazz, latin, blues and pop roots, conveys love as the uniting factor for all peoples.

Seated cross-legged on a bed in her dressing room, she flashes a tired smile.

"I truly like songs that say something relevant. I think its very important that people not get so sucked in feeling they can't do anything about it," she said.

Throughout the concert, Bofill insisted that love was the answer. A vibrant entertainer, her message did not go unheeded. Bofill did not just sing to the audience, she fretted, chatted, cried and laughed as her sultry voice carried her through many moods. By the end of her performance, the audience held hands and sang "share your love with the world" even after the talented vocalist exited.

Bofill gently brushed her forehead with her hand. She winked her eyes merrily. "Blondie's thing is really funny," she said. "Really relevant songs of today." Her mouth burst into a wide smile.

Bofill grew up in the West Bronx, where she began singing with her father at the age of four. Attending the Manhattan School of Music, Bofill composed her first hit "Over the Moon and Under the Sky." In 1978 she released her debut album "Angie".

Often compared to Billie Holiday, Bofill said she was "really flattered because she's a good singer." Holiday combatted drugs and racism in a society where "she was a star on stage and offstage she was treated like dirt."

Bofill's advice to starting musicians is "try to do what's in their heart and not be so preoccupied with making the bucks...if you're not doing or saying something you believe in, well I don't think its worth doing."

Posing playfully before photographers, a happy and tired Bofill said "Take a picture of my manager. He loves all these pictures." Well known for "Angel of the Night" Bofill is truly a human angel.

DuBois: The future of Negro history week

Editor's Note: The following is an excerpt from an article written by Dr. W. E. B. Du Bois in the Compass Magazine, Feb. 11, 1951. In 1925, Dr. DuBois and Dr. Carter G. Woodson, black historian, initiated a week dedicated to the cultural, scientific and political achievements of American blacks. This week was later extended into our current Black History Month.

After the death of Carter Woodson last April, I wrote of him that his crowning achievement was the establishment of Negroe History Week. "He literally made this country which has only the slightest respect for people of color, recognize and celebrate each year a week in which it studied the effect which the American Negro has had upon life, thought and action in the United States. I know of no man who in a lifetime has unaided built up such a national celebration."

My own contribution to Negro History Week lay in my long effort as a historian and sociologist to make America and Negroes themselves aware of the significant facts of Negroe History. The worst effect of slavery was to make Negroes doubt themselves and share in the national contempt for black folk. This, from the publication of my first book on the slave trade in 1896, I tried to correct.

From that I turned to an attempt to place the Negroe problem in the United States on a scientific basis with the 15 annual Atlanta University studies. We could never get funds for the complete work we wanted to do, but we made a start on which others have built enduring studies. As editor of the Negro monthly, the Crisis, for 1910 to 1934, I hammered as stopping black folk from being ashamed of being called "Negroes"; of shrinking at having their dark skins appear in print; and I brought again and again the deeds of black folk to common knowledge. We compelled the leading newspapers and publishers to capitalize the word "Negro" which had lost its capital letter with the rise of the Cotton Kingdom about 1830.

The First National Holiday

Numbers of school text-books and some surveys of history still omit or lie about Negroes, but this attitude Negro History Week is steadily attacking. Not long since, a Negro pupil in a Brooklyn Public School was reprimanded for asserting that Negro soldiers fought in the Civil War. May Quinn still has permission from the New York Board of Education to keep her position in the schools. She advised her Negro pupils not to go "where they are not wanted." But for the most part, the Negro child today learns at home and in school that the statement which I published in 1939 was a fair statement of the truth: "It is astonishing how the African has integrated himself into American civilization. The first national holiday, the fifth of March, commemorated the death of Crispus Attucks. In the War of 1812, the Civil War, the Spanish War and the World War, Negroe soldiers were prominent.

Since 1920, an American Negroe has been given the Nobel Peace Prize, another has written three novels which have been nation-wide "best sellers" and a Negro has become a general in the United States Army.

There comes, however, today a question of the deeper meaning in all this and of future aims. The nations of the world are willing to admit that skin-color and race distinctions which played so fatal a role formerly in social policy and government are no scientific basis for discrimination; that present humanity represents persons of essentially equal gift and right to progress. What now does Negro History Week stand for? Shall American Negroes continue to learn to be "proud" of themselves, or is there a higher, broader aim for their research and study?

In other words, as it becomes more universally known what Negroes contributed to America in the past, more must logically be said and taught concerning the future. What role ought Negroes to play in the development of the problems of our present crisis? For generations, Negroes have aimed to become equals to white Americans. But there are different sorts of white Americans with different ideals and methods. It is of fatal importance to this land which persons and thoughts prevail in a future United States.

Quite naturally, certain American characteristics and culture patterns have attracted Negroes and immigrants from Europe and Asia, and these are often the most [illegible] of our tendencies: our greed, wealth among certain individuals and groups; our [illegible] luxuries; our gambling and [illegible] our [illegible] meetings; the pressure we put on success at any price; our individual freedom to make other individuals slaves; our private initiative to make some unhappy.

American Negroes are not yet aware of the economic basis of race prejudice and of the methods by which American wealth today is centering and broadening imperialism in Africa and Asia in the West, Indies and Central and South America. Indeed, further than that the lack of fundamental economic knowledge in America is emphasized in Negroe colleges and leaves the working class harassed and puzzled as to the way which Big Business today plays to harass social analysis. Here is a task for Negro History Week.

From all this it follows that in future, Negro History Week, if it remains true to the ideals of Carter Woodson, and if it follows the logical development of the Negro race in America, will not confine its study to the past, it will not lose itself in boasting and vain-glory over what we have accomplished; it will not mistake wealth as the measure of America, nor bigness and noise as World Domination. It will concentrate on study of the present, listening as earnestly to Paul Robeson and Howard Fast as to Dean Acheson and Dwight Eisenhower; it will not be afraid of radical literature nor dazzled by Time, Life and Fortune. Above all, from the horrible experience of two world wars and the present policies of our military masters, it will become a series of centers set on eternal opposition against wars between the white and colored peoples of the earth. It will teach Negro youth that no matter who wins, such a war wil mean the degradation of the American Negro.

Let Negro History Week of the future start with the slogan: Peace, no war!

Tony Crayton, director of the Office of Third World Affairs, spoke at the re-dedication of the Malcolm X Center Saturday evening.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

It's still the same old hang up

The "sexual revolution" is far from over. Unfortunately, however, it's taken the rise of the New Right and groups like the Moral Majority for a lot of people to see that sexual libertaion is still a myth in contemporary American society.

You often hear people refer to our society as "sexually permissive." This conjures up the image that we're generally comfortable with sex and sexuality, and that the days of the sex-negative American Puritan Ethic are history.

Jackson Katz

Young people especially are widely thought to be sexually free, unencumbered by old-fashioned values and if anything, over-indulgent in their sexual appetites. Those of us in a position to know what we're talking about, however, know better.

Victorian Repression, in its modern form, is alive and well these days, and nothing as arbitrary as chronological age separates the sexually free from the sexually hung-up. Young people, although "freer" in many ways compared to, say, our parents' generation, still suffer from many of the same old stereotypes, fears and anxieties that naturally accompany sexually repressed human beings.

Although we've reaped the benefits of those before us who dared to further the cause of human fulfillment by breaking down some of the sexual barriers, our problems concerning sex and our sexuality haven't disappeared over time, they've merely undergone a change in character.

Sure, more of us are having sex, but as we all know, that gives us a whole new set of historically unprecendented problems. Hundreds of thousands of unwanted teenage pregnancies occur each year, about one-third of which are terminated by legal abortions. Sexually transmitted diseases are at near-epidemic proportions, with about 55 percent of all cases of gonorrhea and syphilis occurring in persons under 25.

And these are only some of the more stastically measurable tragedies that are some of the consequences young people pay for trying to express their sexuality in a society whose major decisions are still made predominantly by sexually unliberated older people. If you think young people are just irresponsible and it's unfair to blame the decision-makers in our country, consider this:

Widely available sex education, a fundamental prerequisite for a sexually free society is, contrary to popular belief, still an unrealized dream. Only about one-third of this country's junior and senior high schools have classes which can even be stretched to be called sex education, and of these, larger percentages don't even cover such topics as human reproduction, premarital sex, homosexuality, birth control, and sexual decision-making. Only six states require sex-education courses as part of the secondary school curriculum, and in these times of "fiscal austerity," budget cuts threaten many of these. Obviously human sexuality is not considered basic in the "Back-To-Basics" movement in education.

And, as if we didn't have enough problems already just trying to be healthy sexual beings and carry on the awesome task of trying to sexually free this dehumanizing culture, the conservative mentality has taken hold. The "teach them morals, not contraceptives" attitude is gaining momentum, with related offshoots such as increasing persecution of gay people and condemnation of the open discussion of sexuality in literature, television and music.

With Right-To-Life/Anti-Choice groups (who also typically favor parental consent for teenagers obtaining contraceptives, oppose sex education and generally don't consider teenagers as individual, sexual, human beings) gaining increasing political power, things are sure to get worse before they get better.

So what can we do about all of this? Like old Abbie H. says, think big and start small. (No pun intended). The best thing we can do is try to live and enjoy ourselves, our sexuality and our humanity. And when our right to do this is challenged, we have to stand up and fight. A good place to start, right here at old "liberal" UMass, is to fight the outrageous intrusion on our personal lives in the form of trying to impose updated morality be segregating the bathrooms in the coed dorms.

Racist label is ridiculous

In response to Clara Lima's letter 2/23 (Collegian) I would like to say I find her conclusion that people are racist who don't read Nummo News ridiculous.

Nummo News does deal with Third World issues and news—that's true. But what Clara forgot to mention was Nummo News deals only with news pertaining to Third World issues.

It is not an act of ignorance or racism that causes people not to choose to read Nummo News—it is the fault of the paper for not being geared to everyone. The language, tone, and topics segregate the audience. If Nummo News would broaden its scope to the millions of people who are oppressed and not part of Third World countries, maybe the audience would broaden, too.

Education is a right, not a privilege

I am very concerned and upset with the prospects of not being able to attend school. The President Reagan's proposals to drastically cut funding for financial aid and federally guaranteed student loans are taking us back to the era when only children of the affluent were able to attend college. Many students like myself, who cannot afford to attend school without the help of the government, will not have the chance to escape from the ranks of the minimum wage earners. Education is the right of every person, not the privilege of the few that can afford it.

Graduation should be on a Sunday

Why must UMass be different from all other schools and have graduation ceremonies on Saturday? Can't we have it on Sunday like everyone else? This would alleviate a lot of problems for the Jewish people on campus.

On Saturday, which is the Jewish Sabbath, Jews are prohibited from carrying from private to public places. While there are 38 other prohibitions, which are all important, this is the most immediate. Most importantly, however, it is a day devoted to transcending the material world and uplifting one's spiritual awareness. Christianity, as far as I know, does not prohibit such things on their Sabbath.

I implore that the Calendar Committee have Sunday as Graduation Day so that I, too, may receive my diploma with my classmates. Please respect my religious freedom.

What's in a name?

We feel that it is safe to assume that the officials of the University of Massachusetts are making extensive efforts to improve the image of UMass. It is also obvious to all the people associated with the University that we have obtained an unsavory reputation as a playground for adolescent school children.

Several times we have observed the reactions of friends after we have informed them that we are attending UMass. They'll ask, "You mean Zoo-Mass?" At this point, any attempt to convince them that UMass is actually an institution for higher learning is in vain.

What we propose is a rearranging of sorts—not of students, not of teacher, not of books or courses or any other important item of good ol' UMass. Instead, we suggest the University of Massachusetts change its name.

"Why the heck for?" you inquire.

Consider this: The University of Massachusetts at Amherst, better known as UMass, is regarded by the majority of the state, including potential new students, as a recluse for a band of rowdies. Partying, violence, low grades, and generally low standards all around are how we're viewed from the outside. How we hope to see ourselves is as a University with a multi-facilitated and scenic campus thriving with a large group of good and hard working students, teachers, and administrators alike.

What we definitely need is to improve our image. What better way to start than with a change in our name.

We need to get rid of the "Zoo-Mass" connotation. We (the writers) believe that a change in our name will project to others our desire to improve our look.

What we feel would be a good name is "Massachusetts University," and to shorten it to a nick-name for easier verbal reference, it would be "MUA" (sounds like a radio station).

Now, to the bureaucrats concerned with expense for such a change remember, a name change isn't even a new concept with the University. Known at its conception as Massachusetts Agricultural College, the University changed its name to Massachusetts State College in 1931. And in 1947, the University once more changed its name to the now infamous University of Massachusetts.

If an example of a successful name change is needed, consider the Humble Oil Company, who changed their name to Esso. Not satisfied there, they changed it again and ultimately became the largest corporation in the world known to all as Exxon.

So to University officials who felt closing the campus on Halloween was a step in the right direction, and particularly to Mr. Whitehead, assistant to Chancellor Koffler and University public relations man, we urge you to give a strong consideration to this idea of ours.

Student exchange program adds 6 schools to possible selections

By SCOTT MORITZ
Collegian Correspondent

An increase in the selection possibilities for the University of Massachusetts students to study at different campuses through the National Student Exhange (NSE) is on the rise. Six schools have been added to the program, boosting its membership to 54 schools in 34 states.

NSE, a program enbaling students to go to colleges in other parts of the country while paying in-state tuition, gives participating students priority in housing and course selections. All credits earned are assured transferability, and financial aid is available.

'UMass is the most popular school in the program. We send out and receive...350-400 people every year.'
Irma McClaurin-Allen, UMass coordinator for NSE

According to a NSE newsletter, Kearney State College in Kearney, Kansas, Northeastern Illinois University in Chicago, Oakland University near Detroit, Michigan, Sonoma State University in Rohnert Park, California, Trenton State College in Trenton, New Jersey, and Winthrop College of Rock Hill, South Carolina will be joining the program soon.

NSE was established in 1968 and gradually grew to include 54 schools in all but 16 states. UMass entered the program in 1972 and overs 13,000 students from here have participated since.

Irma McClaurin-Allen, assistant director of transfer affairs and UMass coordinator for NSE said, "UMass is the most popular school in the program. We send out and receive the largest amount of students which amounts to 350-400 people every year." The school that comes closest in terms of volume is Oregon with 50 students.

"We can't do some of the things that smaller schools can in terms of indepth discussions and individual interviews for those interested," said McClaurin-Allen. However, because of its size, the UMass exchange program is able to maintain a high percentage of placement.

84 percent of those applying to schools get their first selection. There is only a three percent failure rate for those who submit three choices, she said.

The most competitive schools in the program are the University of Hawaii at Manoa and the University of South Florida. Most students exchanging from UMass choose the Northwest, picking schools like the University of Oregon, Oregon State University, and California State University at Chico, said McClaurin-Allen.

Sandra Wong, a past exchange student from Hawaii, found UMass enjoyable citing some of the academic programs such as the Five College cooperation, and numerous internship opportunities as some of the advantages to staying.

"I like the program because of the willingness of the people involved to do things," Wong said. She said she attributes this to the feeling that there are "others in the same situation it's a bond that you share."

NSE is a full year or fall semester exchange program. Students interested should apply early in October for the following year in the transfer affairs office in Whitmore.

Bottle bill supporters say success may be possible

Associated Press

BOSTON — Supporters of mandatory deposits for beer and soft drink containers in Massachusetts claimed yesterday they are within striking distance of enacting a bottle bill over Gov. Edward J. King's opposition.

Although the measure has yet to reach the floor of either the House or the Senate, the Committee for a Massachusetts Bottle Bill expressed optimism that its crusade, now in its ninth year, finally might succeed.

Sen. John Olver, D-Amherst, spokesman for the panel, told a press conference that 60 to 66 percent of the lawmakers in both chambers presently are supporting the bill. If King again vetoes the measure, as he did in 1979, the bill would require a two-thirds majority to become law.

This year's freshman class of legislators is a key source of new support. According to Committee Director Gregory P. Levins, 17 of the 22 new lawmakers are lined up behind the bill.

The measure, introduced this year by Rep. Lawrence R. Alexander, D-Marblehead, with more than 90 co-sponsors, would impose nickel deposits on beverage cans and bottles holding less than a quart, and a dime deposit on larger containers. Bottles for hard liquor, wine, milk and fruit juice would be exempted, and there would be a one-year waiting period for the law to take effect.

The Energy Committee heard the bill attacked by a Connecticut legislator, who claimed a similar law in his state has forced up beverage prices.

Rep. Emil "Bennie" Benvenuto, who owns a liquor business in Greenwich, Conn., said the price for a case of Budweiser rose from $8 to $12.72 after deposits were enacted. Cocacola, he said, went from about $6 a case to $10.45. He said the rising prices were encouraging shoppers to cross state lines, and Connecticut's beverage sales had declined 8¼ percent.

Olver, a member of the Energy panel, replied that similar price hikes have occurred in other states soon after they impose deposits. Eventually, though, the prices fall, often to levels below those charged for beverages in throwaway containers, Olver said.

Prince Charles to wed 'Shy Di'

LONDON (AP) — Prince Charles, heir to Britain's throne, will end his bachelorhood this summer, marrying "girl next door" Lady Diana Spencer — 12 years his junior and whose older sister was one of his girlfriends.

The Buckingham Palace announcement of the couple's engagement was issued through the Press Association, Britain's domestic news agency, Tuesday.

It ended months of speculation that the discreet and demure 19-year-old kindergarten teacher — his 16th cousin once removed and herself of royal descent — had captured the 32- year-old prince's heart and would eventually become the Princess of Wales.

The couple made their first appearance after the announcement in the palace gardens, laughing, strolling arm-in-arm. Prince Charles hugged Lady Diana as she showed off her engagement ring to photographers.

Lady Diana, dubbed "Shy Di" by the popular press, first caught Charles' eye as "a splendid 16 year-old," in 1977, Press Association reporter Grania Forbes quoted him as saying during a palace interview yesterday with the couple.

Although Lady Diana grew up on the Spencer family estate in Norfolk county next to the royal family's Sandringham residence, neither she or Charles remembered really meeting until 1977, Ms. Forbes said she was told.

"Charles came for a pheasant shoot. He was really a friend of my sister, Lady Sarah, then," the bride-to-be was quoted saying.

"I remember thinking what fun she was," Prince Charles was reported to have added of Lady Diana.

U.S. training, not fighting, in El Salvador

WASHINGTON (AP) — Pentagon planners have proposed sending additional U.S. military training teams to El Salvador to try and transform that country's ill-prepared army into an effective anti-guerrilla force.

Officials who said this yesterday stressed that there is no proposal under study within the Reagan administration to commit U.S. advisers for field duty with Salvadoran units operating against rebels.

And the officials pointedly drew a distinction between U.S. advisers who accompanied South Vietnamese troops into battle during the Southeast Asian war and the kind of American military specialist assigned to teach Salvadoran officers and enlisted men in rear areas.

A total of 19 U.S. Army specialist have been in El Salvador for weeks. Most are involved in training Salvadoran military personnel to maintain six U.S.-supplied helicopters and teaching Salvadoran pilots how to fly them, although some are working with the Salvadoran command on operations planning.

The new proposals would expand U.S. training activities and probably would involve provision of equipment, including communications gear and possibly some coastal patrol boats and relatively simple planes to support Salvadoran ground units.

Lt. Col. Jerry Grohowski acknowledged that proposals for additional training teams "are under active consideration," but said there has been no decision on specific numbers.

Jon Anderson and family play songs with potential

Jon Anderson
Song of Seven (Atlantic)

By RON MILLER
Collegian Staff

The group Yes went through major personnel changes last year. When the dust had cleared Jon Anderson had split with keyboardist Rick Wakeman. The change seems to have done nothing but good for Anderson and it shows on his new solo album, Song of Seven.

The material is fresh and reeks of optimism. It is clear that Anderson has spent a lot of time with his family since he left Yes. His children perform on the album, and the title track is dedicated to his wife, Jennifer. Their pictures help decorate the inner-sleeve.

Domestication has always seemed to have a negative effect on rock stars. Look at what happened when Greg Allman married Cher and, of course, Linda's out of tune voice is in the background of every Paul McCartney song. Jethro Tull's songwriter Ian Anderson (no relation to Jon) put out the weakest material of his career after he got married, Songs From The Wood.

Jon Anderson's family, however, has inspired him to write the best material he has produced in several years. His contentment is apparent on every track.

All of the songs are short (around four minutes), with the exception of the title track which runs 11:07. This album deserves a lot more publicity than it has received as there are a number of tunes that have the potential to be hit singles.

Among these are "Don't Forget (nostalgia)" and "Straight to the Heart of the Matter." The first is a snappy tune in which Anderson reminisces about the early days of his relationship, singing "I know we're young they say we're irresponsible/But don't you cry our love is not impossible."

"Straight to the Heart of the Matter" features an all-star line-up including Simon Phillips on drums, who played for Jeff Beck when he visited UMass last October, former Cream bass player Jack Bruce, and former Humble Pie guitarist Clem Clemson. They both have the potential to be hits. The lyrics are simple enough for mass appeal, but they are strong musically with Anderson's melodic voice leading the way.

Anderson's major work on the album is the title track. The song features his children doing beautiful harmonies. (Eat your heart out Linda McCartney). It is the culmination of his positiveness as he comes to grips with his idealism. He says, "So we talked about the strength of dreams...Yes we talked about the strength of dreaming."

Jon Anderson is a happy man, and he's put out a solid album to tell everyone about it. The break with Yes appears to be just what he needed. I hope this album eventually gets the attention it deserves.

ABBA's album comes straight from their hearts

ABBA
Super Trouper (Atlantic)

By ERIK VEGH
Collegian Correspondent

This album is great. It has ballads, rockers, and even a live sing-along. The sound is the crystal clear perfection synonymous to ABBA, but there is a new twist to this one. The twist is that ABBA sounds human because Super Trouper is written about themselves.

The lyrics are the gems of Super Trouper. Agneta and Frida sing the lovesongs with an emotional conviction that lets the songs grab you. The rockers lack the biting edge, but the lyrics shine right through.

They took a long hard look at themselves and came up with Super Trouper. For example, the live cut, "The Way Old Friends Do" shows us the friendships between them and us, their audience. "The Winner Takes It All" is a very open account of a failing relationship in the band and is one of the better songs on the album.

All in all, this album is made solely for people's enjoyment. ABBA wants to show us their human side. Super Trouper will make a refreshing addition to your record collection. There was a Swede who heard Super Trouper and exclaimed, "Detta e' inte kattkert, det e' ju fan ta mej bra!", which, in rough translation means they ain't just whistling Dixie!

Latin American art exhibit offers fresh ideas, imagery

Herter Gallery, Herter Hall UMass
Monday-Friday 11-4

By JESSICA LAMONTAGNE
Collegian Correspondent

"33 Plus: Latin American Artists" is the exhibit at the Herter Gallery until February 27. "33 Plus" is a representation of contemporary Latin American art organized from the collections of UMass faculty members Leonel Gongora and John Grillo.

The show is a worthwhile experience. It portrays an interesting and imaginative sample of a new wave of expressionism. Its exposure in the artists' community is significant as is our awareness of the growing social turmoil in Latin America today. Political dissension and unrest in Latin America will be inevitably important in the future.

The exhibit presents an innovative form of subjective expressionism. The artists have adapted Cubist and European expressionist models to fresh ideas and localized imagery, both surrealistic and neo-figurative. The contrasts of varied tone and media in the group visualize the many cultural and political influences on Latin American people We must look beneath the face value of the exhibit. Underlying social frustrations and transitions are expressed in humanistic imagery of men and women, contrasts of aesthetic beauty and unattractiveness, and the presence of both the sacred and the vulgar.

Music from Marlboro will be presented at the UMass Fine Arts Center at 8 this evening. Tickets are still available for this performance of the music of Dvorak, Debussy, and Schumann.

Sir Douglas Quintet is back and better

BORDER WAVE (TAKOMA)
THE SIR DOUGLAS QUINTET

Remember "She's About a Mover" from 1967 or so? Remember the Sir Douglas Quintet? Remember the glorious Tex-Mex sound, with its stuttering Farfisa organs and lyrical lapses into Spanish? Well, it's all back, as Border Wave, the new album from the new version of the Sir Douglas Quintet, shows beyond a doubt. Doug Sahm, his son Shawn, and five other musicians whip up a proper Tex-Mex banquet here, and they're hotter than green chiles.

This album consists mostly of uptempo rockers like "Old Habits, Die Hard" and "You're Gonna Miss Me" with one or two ballads scattered about. A particular gem is the S.D.Q.'s cover of the Kinks' classic "Who'll Be The Next In Line?" which they transform into a totally different song. The only thing wrong with Border Wave is its lyrical vapidity; the only thing Doug Sahm seems capable of writing about is how he feels when a relationship ends. But give the guy a break—he's probably been washing cars or something during the ten years since "She's About a Mover." Border Wave is an excellent album.

"Alex was just very difficult to get along with," says Donoghue, now an accountant in Greenfield. "He didn't like me and the feeling was mutual. I never knew why, and it wasn't like I didn't try to sit down and talk with the man, but we just did not get along. Alex Eldridge was a complicated man."

"You could question Alex's style," Johnson said. "You could question they way he acted sometimes. But, on the court, the man was amazing."

Donoghue wouldn't disagree.

"Alex was the best basketball player I ever played with," he says. "No question about it. He should have been in the NBA. He was that good. He was a totally unselfish basketball player. It was the one reason why you could live with him.

"Don't get me wrong," Donoghue said. "I thought it was terrible that a young man that was as talented as he was had to die. No one understands those things."

No one really understood Eldridge, either. Perhaps one who did was current UMass head coach Ray Wilson.

"I always felt that Alex was a different talent," Wilson said after hearing of Eldridge's death last June 27. "He marched to a different drummer. We just didn't understand him."

If we didn't understand Eldridge in life, it was even more difficult to understand why a 24 year old man was dead.

"I was working," Johnson recalls. "Skip Floyd (former UMass manager) came in and told me. It was shocking, you know? Something like that makes you just stop and think."

Johnson has thought about it for eight months now, and it makes as little sense to him now as it did then. And it all made him think of today, of UMass basketball three years after Alex Eldridge played at the Cage.

"It (UMass basketball) was totally different," Johnson says. "I mean, people were lined up on the floor. This place was tough for visiting teams to come into because the fans were really into the game."

But, for Johnson, that is all gone, now.

"There is a coldness here, now," he says. "You never see old players coming back—players like Derick (Claiborne) or Eric (Williams) or Mike (Pyatt)—there's a feeling in their guts that won't let them come back to watch games. It's the coldness."

Mary Custard, who spoke during the tribute last night, broke down in the end.

"Boobie loved the crowd here at the Cage," she said. "And he used his talent to show that love. So tonight I'm asking you to applaud his life, to remember him, and the things he did here by supporting us in our effort to retire his number 24, and to establish the Alex Eldridge scholarship fund."

Custard held the back of Eldridge's warm up jacket to the crowd, and it didn't take long. The 2352 in the Cage, half of what used to be there three years ago, rose and clapped their hands red for one minute to remember Alex Eldridge.

But, in the end, it all seemed so wrong. Half the crowd was gone, the other half silent, and UMass had lost by 40 points.

It just didn't seem right.

Brad Johnson zipped up the front of his jacket, said goodbye to a few friends, and went home.

Professor speaks of women's role in peace

Women must form unions to change in order to keep peace, Political Science Professor Jean Elshtain said yesterday during a seminar in Thompson Lobster.

The seminar titled "Women, War and Feminism" and sponsored by the Social Thought and Political Economy Department, was the first of a series to be held this spring.

Elshtain said she became interested in the subject because she "has children of her own and nephews, and wonders how they were then dragged off to war."

Of war and women, Elshtain said, "Many linked the women's getting the vote to their work during World War I but, such gains are turned by their returns."

"If war is considered on its proper scale/stakes," she said, "between pursuits of conflict like suffragettes would fall into the rubber categories and stand for peace and against foreign wars."

Elshtain outlined the "just war", where before entering a conflict, countries would conduct debates and ask for public input. She used Vietnam as an example of an unjust war.

"No students ever could be a 'just war'," she said. But added, "one way that we fight will be just, just because we are a country that feels it must justify itself."

"I as an American cannot say what El Salvador should be doing," said Elshtain, "only what the American government should or shouldn't be doing."

Feminists must integrate 'maternal thinking' into their political thought, she said. "Words are more powerful than musicians."

Conference to focus on issues

About 200 student activists from colleges and universities throughout New England are expected to attend an organizational conference for the Progressive Student Network (PSN) at the University of Massachusetts this weekend.

PSN member Mimi Fairchild said developments in El Salvador and political advances by the New Right will be focal points of the conference, which will begin Friday night with a free showing of the film "El Salvador, the Next Vietnam."

Educational workshops will be held on Saturday morning at sessions in the Campus Center with speakers addressing such issues as energy, antiracism, trade unionism, women's rights and others.

The PSN was formed to give a sense of unity to single interest groups on campuses across the nation who share a common political perspective, Gutchinson said.

"The Network is attempting to build unity on campus, to bring individuals and single interest groups together," she said.

The second day of Saturday's workshops will be devoted to a training "activist skills" such as organizing, leafleting and campus communications formation, Fairchild said.

Along with the workshops a panel of speakers representing the Black Women's Gay Lesbian Students, and Latino movements will address the public from 7 to 10 Saturday night. Among the speakers will be Bill Fletcher of the Boston jobs coalition, Karen Lindsay, artist, writer and poet, and Carl Gentz, student representative from Brown University.

A $3 registration fee will be required to attend the PSN workshops. PSN member Jim Cannon said. Saturday night and the panel discussion will be free and open to the public, he said.

Managers want new union

By BOB MILLER

Low level management employees are trying to form a new union on campus to represent between 450 and 500 workers.

Joan M. Stein, a spokesperson for the group, which would not insert the Union of Professional Employees, said the group is in the beginning stages of organization.

Stein said a card drive is in progress in which signatures are being gathered. In order to become a recognized bargaining unit, the union must get signatures from 30 percent of the people they hope to represent, according to state law.

Stein said the group is going for 30 percent of the workers, and "we're close to that now," she said.

After they gather the signed cards, the Massachusetts Labor Commission decides if the signatures are valid, and then an election is held where the employees decide if they want a union.

Stein said they have been working for the last year to try to gather the signatures and that they encourage people to sign, "and we'll fight for them."

She said the University is the only state college that doesn't have any bargaining rights for low level management.

The group is holding the first meeting of all potential members tomorrow. They hope to get everyone who comes to go out and get one person to sign a card, Stein said.

Salary and job survival are the biggest issues for the area, she said.

"Being non-union, you leave yourself open to possibly losing your job," because non-union people have to be laid off before union people, she said.

The union, which would represent about 240-250non-Boston employees also hopes to become affiliated with the Massachusetts Teachers Association, which represents two unions on campus, The Massachusetts Society of Professors and the University Staff Association.

Stein said they are not eligible to be in the other unions.

"We're sort of invisible. We're all doing different jobs," she said.
